Women inhibited by breast-lump fears

Women's reluctance to turn up for check-ups is the biggest cause of delay in treating breast cancer, according to a study of 686 women who attended the breast clinic at a London teaching hospital. Most women have their cancer diagnosed quickly, and are treated quickly; often, it transpires, they don't have cancer at all. Some, however, are so fearful of what their lump might be that they don't go to see the doctor until it's too late. Page 3

How to grow a human

A leading embryologist - Jonathan Slack, of Bath University - has triggered controversy by showing that headless frog embryos can be grown in the laboratory. The technique implies the possibility of growing parts of humans so that organs could be created for transplant but should it be allowed to happen? Page 3

Greening the market

Long ago it was suggested at the Rio Earth Summit that developed countries should avoid transporting our food across vast distances which could very often be bought from farmers on our own doorstep. In America, so-called 'farmer's markets' have already become common, and popular; here they are just on the point of returning. Page 24

The Mafia lives on

Reports of the death of the Mafia were much exaggerated - or so it now transpires. Our Rome correspondent has found that, while there have been many arrests of mafiosi in recent years, and several convictions, the Cosa Nostra organisation remains wholly intact. Page 7

SEEN & HEARD

Look out at the bird table, and watch those poor starving birds forced to sit by while squirrels invade the garden and eat all their nuts. One company, however, has brought relief. It proposes to defeat the thieving rodents by springing a nasty surprise next time they start helping themselves to someone else's food. The application of a finely-ground layer of capsaicin to the bird food gives the squirrels the sensation of eating the fiercest of curries. The birds cannot taste the sharp spice, and much happily on. The squirrels, however, don't even have the option of swilling a lager to cool their mouths down, poor things.

Gypsies invade Dover, hoping for a handout

Scores of gypsies from the Czech Republic and Slovakia, including the boy pictured above and his family, have been put into bed-and-breakfast and guest houses on the Kent coast after arriving in Dover at the weekend in the hope of being granted asylum here.

The influx of would-be immigrants, who are claiming racial persecution at home, took local authorities by surprise. They are being put up in bed-and-breakfast hostels in Dover and in a family centre in the town and at a nursing home in Margate. On Friday 13 gypsies arrived by ferry after travelling by coach through Europe; another 32 landed on Saturday and 22 more yesterday.

Gwynn Prosser, Labour MP for Dover, will today meet Mike

O'Brien, the immigration minister, to request assistance. A warning by Roger Gale, Conservative MP for Thanet North, that 3,000 more gypsies were on their way, was condemned as scaremongering by Mr O'Brien yesterday. However, Mr O'Brien acknowledged that further arrivals were inevitable until word filtered back to Slovakia and the Czech Republic that Britain was not a soft option. Some gypsies report having seen a television programme at home which said the British welfare system would support them.

The influx of gypsies began several months ago, but until Friday was just a trickle, comprising about 60 families in total. Of the weekend's arrivals, 36 people were immediately deported and 28 left voluntarily. Twenty-two others, mainly heads of families, were detained by immigration authorities. "Our resources are being drained quite rapidly," said Terry Birkett, leader of Dover District Council. "Kent cannot bear the full burden of these people."

Mr O'Brien said that each of the cases was being considered individually. He added that asylum had not been granted to any of the gypsies who had arrived in recent months. "We are determined to protect the integrity of the system from abuse, so that we can continue to provide for genuine refugees."

City set to punish Brown over EMU confusion

Gordon Brown, the Chancellor, last night tried to calm City nerves at the end of a weekend of confusion over British entry to the single European currency. Colin Brown and Nigel Cope look at the Government's biggest test since the election.

The Government will hold its breath today as the financial markets react to uncertain messages over monetary union, 10 years to the day after the stock market crash of 1987.

Gordon Brown was last night forced to intervene as the Government faced its sharpest criticism from senior figures in the City for failing to make clear whether it was ruling out entry for the next five years.

Mr Brown's remarks left open the possibility of Britain joining the second wave, although Government sources continued to make it clear that entry was "highly unlikely" before the next general election.

Brushing aside Tory demands for the recall of Parliament, Mr Brown said on BBC TV: "I can't answer for every newspaper that speculates about the outcome of our deliberations will be... what I did say all the time before the election is that it's highly unlikely we will join in 1999."

"There are formidable obstacles to this. What was new in my Times interview was that we were not going to make the mistakes of the Conservatives over the ERM, where their indecisiveness caused long periods of speculation that were damaging to the national economic interest."

The Chancellor will tell the City today that he will not be "bounced" into giving an early policy statement on Britain's entry into the single currency when he visits trading floors on the opening of new computer systems for stock market trading.

Without publicly closing the options before a statement in about 10 days to Parliament, he will make it clear that Britain will not be joining the single currency in the first wave in 1999 because business has not had time to prepare, and the economic cycles of Britain's European partners were not in line.

However, a senior government source said: "You can take it as read we are not going into the first wave. Beyond that, we have to make a judgement. That is what he will be doing in his Commons statement but we have made it clear that is very unlikely."

In the City, commentators said the confusion that had been created by contradictory off-the-record briefings had damaged, perhaps permanently, the government's credibility with the financial markets.

Gerard Lyons, chief economist at Japanese Bank DKB said: "Gordon Brown has gone from Iron Chancellor to Flash Gordon."

Traders face a turbulent day with the markets braced for a volatile session. Most analysts said they expected a fall in share prices and higher long-term interest rates. This assumption follows the sharp rise in the FTSE 100 index of leading shares a few weeks ago when a newspaper report suggested that Britain was likely to adopt for early EMU entry.

Markets are already nervous with today's 10th anniversary of the '87 crash and the start of the new trading system. As Michael Hughes, group economic adviser at investment bank BZW said: "The timing could be better."

Though share prices may come under pressure, some experts said the outlook for taxes would be brighter if Britain does not enter EMU early. Mr Hughes said that if Britain had entered in 1999 the budgets in 1998 and 1999 would have been extremely tough.

Mr Brown is confident that any slide in stocks today will be short-lived. A senior Cabinet source said the Government was using off the record briefings to harden its line, because it wanted to maintain its influence within Europe. Publicly ruling out entry to the single currency for five years would leave Britain out of the key decisions over EMU, when it was about to take over the six-month presidency.

The uncertainty was caused by Mr Brown's interview in the Times on Saturday under the headline "Brown rules out single currency for lifetime of this Parliament". His words did not back up the headline, but Treasury spin doctors said they were happy with the message. Confusion in the City was deepened yesterday by Frank Dobson, the Secretary of State for Health, insisting "nothing can be ruled out".

The Independent understands that Mr Dobson was sticking to an agreed Treasury line, leaving open the door to entry in the second wave of the single currency, but it opened the Government to attack by John Redwood and Peter Lilley, the Shadow Chancellor, that there was chaos at the heart of Government on its most crucial policy.

"We smell blood in the water, and we may be able to force them off entry," said another senior Tory source.

Tony Blair ordered Mr Brown to harden the line against entry last week, and reverse the momentum which was coming from the Treasury in favour of Britain's membership of EMU, after they discussed the results of a five-month Treasury review showing it could cost a reported £20bn to join, the equivalent of 10p on the standard rate of income tax.

Stormin' Norman asks a question too far

"It's a bit of a trial being so far ahead of my party that I am called a dinosaur," said Norman Tebbit, adopting his customary air of injured innocence when he was slapped down by William Hague at the Tory Party conference. "Some of my colleagues are still in the pre-Jurassic age."

Now Lord Tebbit is pushing the frontiers of advanced reptilian thinking even further. He has tabled a series of parliamentary questions in the Lords asking the Government for definitions of the word "family". The order paper for the Upper House last week listed the following question against the noble lord's name: "To ask Her Majesty's Government whether their definition of the word 'family' includes two practising sodomites living at the same address."

Then there are another three questions, which ask whether "two lesbian women at the same address" are a family, or "two lesbian women having care or custody of a child living at the same address", or even "two heterosexual males living at the same address".

No doubt this is regarded as a side-splitting stunt in the bars of Chingford. But Lord Tebbit insisted yesterday that he was making a serious point. "Suppose, in the unfortunate event that my wife should pre-decease me, that I went to live with a male chum, and claimed to be in a homosexual relationship. What then?" Would he be able to inherit a council tenancy or gain pension rights?

For many Tories, this is just another Tebbitism giving the PC lobby a poke in the eye. But Mr Hague fears that it gives the wrong impression of modern Conservatism. So when Lord Tebbit attacked multiculturalism on the conference fringe earlier this month, he was denounced by Mr Hague's aides for feeding racist instincts. For several days after Mr Hague's denunciation, Lord Tebbit gained easy headlines by repeating what he had said about British cultural identity. Then came the Government's announcement that same-sex partners would have the right to immigrate, although not the same right as married partners. Lord Tebbit wheeled out what is obviously one of his favourite words: this would "place sodomite marriage on the same standing as the honourable estate of matrimony", he intoned.

But the reason he advanced so far in the Tory party is that he is more than a rent-a-quote bigot. He is a surprisingly engaging and even slightly self-effacing man in private, with a wicked sense of humour - and a tin ear for the sensibilities of the victims of prejudice. He also believes that he understands the true instincts of the electorate.

Now he has surely gone too far, using public money and the time of public servants to answer what are essentially rhetorical questions. And he loses sight of any serious point he might have by asking a fifth question worthy of Bernard Manning: "To ask Her Majesty's Government whether in order to claim the advantages of the status of 'partners', males living at the same address are required to give assurances that they engage in homosexual intercourse."

Public-school pupil killed in police car chase

A brilliant student was killed on Saturday when his car crashed into the gates of his public school after a high speed police chase.

Julian Elwell, aged 17, was trapped inside his red Fiat Tiipo which burst into flames after demolishing a ten-foot stone pillar and part of a stone wall outside his dormitory. Staff at Malvern College, rushed outside and helped police officers put out the flames with fire extinguishers.

But Julian - who was expected to win a place at either Oxford or Cambridge next year - died before firefighters could free him from the wreckage.

West Mercia Police yesterday launched an investigation into the tragedy which occurred after Julian drove off at high speed when he was approached by a policeman in the Worcestershire spa town.

The teenager's car was seen shortly after 9pm on parked outside the Unicorn - a pub popular with young people in Malvern town centre.

But the Fiat drove off when the police panda car pulled up so officers could speak to the driver.

The patrol car, driven by PC Paul Lambourn, pursued the Fiat through Malvern for about a mile back to the college in College Road. "The vehicle ignored a red traffic light and narrowly avoided an accident with another car," said a police spokesman.

"At the time of the accident the vehicle was some 200 metres ahead of the police car. The incident lasted two to three minutes in total. Police officers made repeated attempts to extinguish the fire and rescue the occupant," the spokesman added.

Fellow pupils who lived with Julian in No. 8 house heard the crash and had to be taken back inside the dormitory in tears by teachers.

"The children are absolutely devastated," said the college registrar, Sheila Jackson. Other pupils at the college were told about Julian's death by headmaster Hugh Carson at a service in the college chapel yesterday morning.

Firefighter Mick Browning said: "I would imagine he hit the wall with some force at some speed. The car snapped across the middle and then catapulted into itself. It hit the pillar and then catapulted onto its roof before ending up on its side with the driver's door burst open. I think the driver was alive when we got there. We had to use cutting equipment and a powered winch to get the lad out because he was trapped by his legs."

Pupils at the college are not allowed to drink at pubs in the town unless they are 18 and have their housemaster's permission. Chris Lush, 44, licensee of the Unicorn, said: "We liaise closely with the college. Pupils have ID cards and they have to produce them to get served."

West Mercia Police has called in the police complaints authority to investigate the accident and is appealing for witnesses to come forward.

McAleese defended after Sinn Fein leak

The Irish Prime Minister, Bertie Ahern, yesterday came to the aid of embattled presidential election candidate Mary McAleese. He forecast that the Belfast-based law professor government nominee - the focal point of a series of leaked government documents about her alleged sympathies towards Sinn Fein - would approach the sensitivities of Northern Ireland "with care and consideration".

He added: "No one has the right to question her Irishness - or her total commitment to peace on this island."

Mr Ahern's ringing endorsement

ment of Ms McAleese's increasingly controversial candidacy followed the mystery circulation to newspapers of official confidential memorandums pointing up her apparent backing for Sinn

Fein. Ms McAleese has strenuously rejected the suggestion, but the effects of the row on her standing as the opinion poll front-runner for the 30 October poll have still to be gauged. Her position was further complicated when the Sinn Fein President, Gerry Adams, signalled his personal backing for her.

Irish foreign minister, David Andrews, whose department is at the centre of the leaking furore, highlighted his government's condemnation of the practice. He declared: "Police investigations will begin immediately. We are determined to get to the bottom of this."

Kiwis top the good health league

If you want to keep the doctor away, leave your apples in the fruit bowl and switch to a kiwi fruit, new research suggests. The bairy green fruit has been named the "most nutritionally dense" fruit out of list of 27 commonly eaten species. In particular, it scored highly for Vitamins C and E, magnesium, potassium and fibre.

Other exotic fruits outranked the more mundane produce with papaya, cantaloupe melons and strawberries coming above bananas, oranges and apples. The study, carried out by scientists in the US, measured how many essential vitamins and minerals each fruit provided per 100g of weight.

Kiwi producers say the fruit also contains nutrients recommended to combat cancer and heart disease and other diet-related illnesses. It also has high levels of serotonin which has a calming effect on some people and the amino acid arginine - used to treat impotence.

Arthur Daley-style motor dealers are under threat from the growth of superstores selling second-hand vehicles, it was disclosed yesterday.

Sales from the stores are set to increase almost 10-fold over the next three years, says a report from research organisation MarketLine. "A reliable supply of high value, ex-fleet, cars will enable superstores to compete directly with the franchised dealer sector," said MarketLine analyst Zafar Currimbhoy. The company's report showed that Superstore sales could reach 400,000 a year by the year 2000.

Merchant fleet sinking out of sight

The size of the British merchant fleet has slumped by 12 per cent in the last year, figures revealed yesterday. The UK, once a major shipping country, is now 30th in the world "league table", said the shipmasters' union Numast. There are now only 232 UK-owned trading ships, totalling 2.16 million deadweight tonnes compared with 1,600 ships of 50 million dwt in 1976. "These latest figures are of real concern - not just because of the continuing capacity reduction, but also because the further loss of ships means a further loss of berths in which to train future British seafarers," said Numast's general secretary, Brian Orrell.

Women afraid to confront breast cancer

Delays in the diagnosis of breast cancer are caused mainly by the reluctance of women to attend for check ups.

Jeremy Laurence, Health Editor, reviews a study which shows fear and denial are putting women's lives at risk.

Some women who discover a lump in their breasts delay for months or years before seeking medical help. A study of 686 women who attended the breast clinic at a London teaching hospital revealed that, on average, there was a total delay of almost nine weeks before they were seen and treated.

About two thirds of the delay was due to the women themselves being slow to come forward and the remaining third was due to delays in the system - referrals by GPs or waiting lists for the clinic. Although a large group of women saw their GPs and got referred within three weeks of discovering a lump, the remainder delayed for up to several years, many because they were too frightened to find out whether they had cancer.

The study, at King's Healthcare NHS trust, raises doubts about the correct message to put across to women during the current campaign to raise awareness of the disease. Frightening women may push some into consulting a doctor sooner but it may also deter others.

Professor Anthony David, of the department of psychological medicine at King's, one of the researchers, said the findings were skewed by a small number of women who delayed a very long time before going to a doctor but they contained an important message.

He said: "Most women who find a lump go very quickly to see a doctor, are referred very quickly and are seen very quickly. It is the women who are put off seeing a professional that are the biggest source of delay."

Professor David said there were two reasons why women delayed. "They become so worried at the prospect of bad news that they cannot think clearly and they do not do anything. Or they deny there is a problem and pretend that if they don't think about it, it will go away."

The findings, published as a letter in the British Medical Journal, posed a complex problem for health educators and for government policy, Professor David said. Last May, ministers allocated an extra £10m to breast cancer services to help iron out delays in the system and ensure women were seen sooner.

"If the Government thinks it can get rid of the problem of women presenting late by focussing on the system it is making a serious mistake. If you want to speed up diagnosis you have got to look at the system and the patient."

The answer was to change the culture of fear around breast cancer to one in which the risks were assessed more realistically. Professor David said: "We have got to get women thinking it is abnormal to have a breast lump and they had better get it checked out and get away from the idea that it must be cancer. We want to find out more about why women delay and then we may be in a better position to adjust the health education message."

HOW ONE DAUGHTER SAVED HER MOTHER

Wendy Crabtree knew her mother had cancer when she noticed a stain while washing one of her bras. As a nurse, she recognised the tell-tale sign.

She did not confront her mother immediately. "I wanted her to tell me. If I had gone on at her, she would probably have hidden it more."

By then, the cancer was already far advanced and had become a weeping sore. Wendy's mother, Yvonne Kendrick, 59, pictured right with Wendy, had had a lump in her breast for years and had ignored it, hoping it would go away.

Mrs Kendrick said: "I did go to the doctor years ago when Wendy was small but he said it was just like a bit of gristle. Then about two years ago I got a rash. I thought it was eczema but cream I put on it was no good."

"All sorts of thoughts go through your mind and you think to yourself - no, it can't be that. It was panic really. I just didn't want to know about it."

She finally went back to her doctor who referred her to the breast clinic at Queen Alexandra hospital in Portsmouth. She was reluctant to go, but when she admitted to her daughter what was happening, Mrs Crabtree, 33, who is married with a daughter, took charge.

"I phoned the hospital and demanded an immediate appointment. I wasn't prepared to have my mother wait two or three weeks," she said.

Mrs Kendrick started treatment almost immediately and two years later she is free of the disease although she has to return to hospital every six months for a check-up. The family were so grateful for the care they received that they have since organised two charity balls raising £3,000 for Macmillan Cancer Relief. Macmillan Cancer Relief can be contacted on 0171 351 3511.

New body parts may be what the patient orders

The creation of headless frogs has given rise to the possibility of engineering headless human clones. Clare Comer asks if this could lead ultimately to the production of tailor-made organs for transplants.

and tail. Under current Home Office rules, they are not considered animals until they are a week old, when they have to be destroyed.

Using intact cloned human embryos to grow organs would be out of the question, because they would have to be killed and this would be the equivalent of murder, said Professor Slack.

"It occurred to me a halfway house could be reached," he said.

"Instead of growing an intact embryo, you could genetically reprogramme the embryo to suppress growth in all the parts of the body except the bits you want, plus a heart and blood circula-

Although the headless frog embryos have not been allowed to live longer than a week, scientists believe the technique could be adapted to grow human organs such as hearts, kidneys, livers and pancreases in an embryonic sac living in an artificial womb.

And if cloning becomes possible, people could have organs grown to order from their own cloned cells.

Growing parts of human embryos to cultivate organs could bypass many legal restrictions and ethical concerns, because without a brain or central nervous system the "human sacs" may not meet the technical definition of an embryo.

Jonathan Slack, professor of developmental biology at Bath University and a leading embryologist, said he could create headless frog embryos relatively easily by manipulating certain genes.

Using the technique, he has been able to suppress not only development of a tadpole's head, but also its trunk tion." The controversial research is raised in a BBC2 Horizon this week about the cloning of Dolly the sheep.

Professor Slack said it would not be acceptable to grow parts of a human embryo as an "organ sac" inside a woman's womb.

"More acceptable might be taking a single cell and somehow growing a complete organ in a bottle from it."

Some academics are angered by Professor Slack's ideas. Professor Andrew Linzey, an animal ethicist at Oxford University, said: "This sort of thinking beggars belief. It's scientific fascism, because we would be creating other beings whose very existence would be to serve the dominant group. It is morally regressive to create a mutant form of life."

Coded diary reveals Japanese prison's death and despair

As a Japanese prisoner of war Donald Hill, a young RAF squadron leader, kept a diary written in code. Its discovery would have led to his execution, but, as Kim Sengupta reveals, 55 years on it has been deciphered by an academic and could be turned into a film.

It was while lying awake in the early hours that Philip Aston finally worked out the vital key words which unlocked the diary of Donald Hill.

For six months the mathematics professor had been wrestling with the complex code the POW had used to keep his thoughts secret.

The clue centred on the number 34, the total of the letters in the names Donald Samuel Hill and Pamela Seely Kirtage, the woman he had become engaged to just before being posted to the Far East in 1939.

However, Professor Aston, from Surrey University, still had to carry out some more work before the code was finally cracked from the seemingly random sequence of numbers on the yellowing A4 exercise book, and he could hand it over to Mr Hill's widow, Pamela, and their three children.

Film-makers are taking an interest in the astonishing story of the diary. A Hong Kong Chinese producer apparently sees it as something in the vein of Anthony Minghella's award-winning The English Patient. However, the project is at an embryonic stage and the film-maker does not want to reveal any more details.

Donald Hill was studying accountancy when he joined the RAF and was sent to Singapore at the age of 26 in 1939. He began keeping his diary when he went to Hong Kong in 1941. The time was tense. The first entry, on 7 December 1941, began with the fateful words: "Much talk about war with Japan, no one seems to think anything will happen..." The following day the Japanese struck at Hong Kong. The young squadron leader charts the 17 days of bitter fighting before the outnumbered and outgunned Allied forces surrendered on Christmas Day.

His diary then details capture and incarceration at the Sham Shui Po Camp, with its brutality, starvation and despair. And he also wrote how he was helped to survive by the selfless friendship of a beautiful Chinese girl, Florrie, who smuggled food into the camp for him. She was eventually killed by the Japanese.

The diary finishes soon after that. But Mr Hill managed to keep it hidden from the prison guards and took it with him in Australia, where he and other POWs were sent for rehabilitation after the camp was liberated by British and Indian troops.

On his return to England Mr Hill and Pamela got married and he returned to accountancy. The couple had two daughters and a son. The diary was not decoded - Mr Hill did not want to dwell on the horrors he and his comrades had suffered in captivity. He was also a modest and self-effacing man, and did not relish the prospect of being at the centre of attention and publicity.

and in a prisoner-of-war camp could not. I thought, he all that sophisticated, and with a little help from a computer, should not be too difficult to crack. But I found that was not the case. Mr Hill had obviously taken some care to make sure that this could not be translated if it fell into the wrong hands during the war."

As in all good mysteries, there was a red herring, this time an inadvertent one. Mr Hill had once tried to show his son Christopher how to decipher the numbers. But instead of 34, the combined total of his name and Pamela's, he had by mistake circled 33.

Christopher Hill is now a pilot with British Airways. He sometimes flies into Hong Kong International Airport, the runway of which was built by his father and other POWs when the Japanese military decided to realign it.

Yesterday there was a family party at his home. Mrs Hill, now 81, said: "The diary was a part of Donald's life which had been shut away and I am very glad that Professor Aston managed to open it up for us."

"After the war Donald was quite traumatised, and of course in those days there was little or no official help for people like him. He did not want to go into what happened and I respected that."

Christopher said: "Physically my father was a big man, six foot four inches tall, well-built. However, he was rather shy, and he'd have been very embarrassed by all this fuss."

"The diary does make quite interesting reading. It is not just a diatribe against the Japanese; he was being quite objective and he does try to understand them. What is also clear is how much Florrie, the young Chinese girl, helped him. He and others like him must have gone through a hell of a lot."

Unlike other Japanese POW camps in places like Malaya, there is little by way of record about what went on in Hong Kong during the occupation.

The disclosure of the diary has been followed with keen interest in the former colony and led to interest from the film-maker. Over here, the Imperial War Museum wants the family to bequeath the diary to it, and they say they are quite happy to do so.

He died in 1985. Eleven years later Mrs Hill, who lives in Tunbridge Wells, Kent, mentioned the diary to a voluntary worker from the Soldiers, Sailors & Airmen's Families Association. Colonel Ian Quayle contacted Surrey University and spoke to Professor Aston.

Professor Aston, who specialises in chaos theory, explained that he was not an expert in cryptography. However, he reasoned: "A code written over 50 years ago

Drug link to road rage death denied

Events surrounding the death of a couple killed in a road rage incident took a new twist with allegations of a possible drugs link. Toby Exley's family confirmed that he had a drugs conviction, but, as Kathy Marks reports, they believe it played no part in his death.

Toby Exley, who died with his girlfriend, Karen Martin, when their car was rammed into the path of another vehicle, had a conviction for possession of drugs, his family said yesterday.

However, the family said in a statement that it was "disgusted" by allegations in yesterday's newspapers that Mr Exley was a dealer.

"Toby's offence was a one-off mistake," the statement said. He had "no connection with drug warlords or barons", nor had he sold drugs to young people, as alleged.

"Toby was killed, murdered by a raging madman," the family said. "It was not provoked."

The statement was in response to reports yesterday that Mr Exley, 22, had been convicted of dealing and could have been targeted by an angry customer. Scotland Yard refused to discuss the reports and said detectives were following numerous lines of enquiry.

Ms Martin's father, John, said that he had known of Mr Exley's conviction, but had been told by police that they were satisfied that there was no link with the incident.

The couple were killed two weeks ago when their Ford Fiesta was forced across the central reservation of the A316, in Hanwell, west London, where it was hit by a Vauxhall Cavalier. Police are searching for the car that rammed them from behind.

According to the News of the World, Mr Exley, from Teddington, Middlesex, was found guilty at Kingston Crown Court last year of possessing Ecstasy, cannabis and amphetamines with intent to supply. He was fined £210 and placed on probation for two years.

The newspaper alleged that he continued to supply drugs and quoted "underworld sources" as saying that he had made enemies by "cutting" the cocaine that he sold. Police have said they believe that Mr Exley's car was hit because the motorist behind was irritated that he was driving too slowly.

Diana legacy lives on in new drive against landmines

George Robertson, the Secretary of State for Defence, is to announce an initiative to speed up clearance of an estimated 750,000 mines. The Government has led global action to ban landmines in initiatives that have led Labour to Diana's legacy. Funds for mine clearance are to be doubled to £10m a year to support projects in the former Yugoslavia as well as Angola, Iraq, Cambodia, Afghanistan, Yemen, Somalia, Laos and Eritrea.

A mines information and training centre is to be set up within the MoD. It will spread British expertise in de-mining operations, training humanitarian organisations such as the Red Cross. There are also plans to give local people expertise to clear mines rather than having to rely solely on overseas aid, which is not always forthcoming. An estimated 100 million mines are scattered in 70 countries worldwide.

It will be launched by the Queen at the opening of the Commonwealth summit in Edinburgh, later this week, and features areas in which Britain excels, including fashion, technology and financial services. In an interview with Time magazine, Mr Blair said it was time to accept the end of the Empire. "We cannot pretend that the Empire is back, because it is not. My generation has moved on beyond all that," he said. "When I see the pageantry in Britain, I think that is great, but it does not define where Britain is today. The whole idea of a modern British identity is not to displace the past, but to honour it by applying its past characteristics to today's world."

Britain: The Movie, directed by Tony Blair

The Prime Minister wants to update Britain's proud tradition of pageantry. He has commissioned a new video to emphasise youth and vibrancy. Kate Watson-Smyth says Tony Blair's quest for modernisation shows no sign of flagging.

In future, visiting heads of state will no longer be greeted by a procession of bagpipers and bearskins, but will instead be shown a video.

Mr Blair wants to replace what he regards as the outdated customary trappings of British ceremony, and the video, Britain: the Young Country, is designed to rebrand the UK as a youthful, and "vibrant" nation.

The Prime Minister wants every head of state who comes to Britain to feel that the country is changing for the better and is full of creative and talented people.

In a speech on Friday, Mr Blair will not only use his speech to project Britain to the world but also to put forward his vision of the Commonwealth. "I believe the Commonwealth is needed more today than at any time in its history. It is a global community of nations, an organisation of moral principle and enduring values that provides stability in a more dangerous world order," he will say.

After speech the visiting heads of government will be treated to a programme of singing, dance and music. Then they will be invited to watch the new video.

Visitors for nurses held in Saudi jail

The relatives of the two British nurses will visit them for the third time today in the Saudi jail where they are being held over the murder of an Australian colleague, Yvonne Gilford. Lucille McLauchlan's fiancé, Grant Ferrie, and Deborah Parry's sister and brother-in-law, Sandra and Jonathan Ashbee, who flew out to Saudi Arabia on Friday will then return to Britain.

McLauchlan, 31, of Dundee, has been sentenced to 500 lashes and eight years in jail. Parry, 38, of Alton in Hampshire, is waiting to hear whether she has been found guilty of intentional murder and sentenced to death. But according to a Saudi ambassador, a £750,000 "blood money" deal made with the victim's brother, Frank Gilford, lifts the threat of execution, and could mean a review of McLauchlan's sentence.

Evidence on low pay

The Low Pay Commission will make its first regional visits this week to hear evidence before recommending a new minimum wage to the Government next year. Meetings will be held with business leaders, voluntary organisations, workers as well as the unemployed in Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee and Larness.

Wheelchair in car crash

An 18-year-old woman voluntarily went to a police station in Cambridge after an accident when a car failed to stop in Funtstann after colliding with a woman in a wheelchair. The 28-year-old victim had both legs broken. The car then hit two men walking on the footpath. Both had leg and facial injuries. Police said a blood sample was taken from the teenager for forensic analysis and she was hailed to 24 November.

Penguins go on sale

A collection of 2,000 birds, including penguins, flamingos, owls and parrots, are to be auctioned this week. Kevin Martin, general manager of Merley Bird Gardens, near Wimborne, Dorset, blamed yesterday's closure of the gardens on rising costs and a "dramatic" fall in visitor numbers caused by changing leisure pursuits, including theme park visits. Opened in 1966, the four-acre gardens attracted 150,000 visitors in 1988 but just 50,000 last year.

Frenchman to be questioned over Russell murders

A former mental patient awaiting extradition on suspicion of committing a triple murder in France, is to be questioned by officers investigating the deaths of Lin and Megan Russell.

Kent Police want to interview Jacques Girardin, a Frenchman who has been charged with the murder of a mother and her two young children in France. His alleged crime bears a remarkable similarity to the unsolved murder of Mrs Russell and her six-year-old daughter in Chillingham, near Canterbury, in July last year.

Mr Girardin, 39, who was arrested in Manchester a week ago, is awaiting extradition to France. Kent Police are to interview him and take DNA samples while the extradition proceedings are being completed. Detective Chief Inspector Dave Stevens, the officer investigating the Russell murders, said: "I will be talking to him soon. It is early days and, like many other lines of inquiry, this one is ongoing."

The bodies of Pascale Longesserre, 38, her four-year-old son, Florian, and 18-month-old daughter, Camille, were found stabbed and battered with a hammer 18 days ago at their flat in Angers, north-west France. Mrs Russell and Megan were also bled to death with a hammer. Mrs Russell's eldest daughter, Josie, was also attacked and left for dead, but has made a remarkable recovery.

Mr Girardin is thought to have been questioned by officers investigating the murder of British schoolgirl Caroline Dickinson, who was raped and suffocated on a school holiday to Brittany in July 1996. It is understood that he is also to be interviewed by Irish police investigating the murder of French film producer, Sophie Toscanu Plantier, found battered to death outside her home in Co Cork, after Christmas last year. — Clare Garner

Compared with the shots you can take with the Dimâge V, other digital cameras simply don't get a look in. Literally. Because unlike any other digital camera in the world, the Dimâge V lens can be used remotely, when connected by its 1 metre umbilical cord. Allowing you to get into all manner of places. Exactly where, is probably best left to your own imagination. Just place the lens where you want it and what you can't see with the naked eye, you can see, record and play back, on the camera's colour LCD finder monitor.

Combine this with a lens that can rotate a full 180 degrees when it's on the camera, plus a built-in flash to throw some light on the subject and naturally, auto exposure and you really do have it made. And the advantages don't stop there. The Dimâge V has a 2.7x zoom lens (equivalent to 34mm - 92mm) and Macro, which lets you get as close as 6cms to an object the size of a standard business card. So as well as being able to get in close, you also have the additional advantage of being able to zoom in as well. Allowing you to get the exact shot you want. First time. Without having to use your computer to zoom in and consequently, suffer loss of resolution to picture quality.

As one of the world's great camera manufacturers, picture quality is something pretty close to our hearts, and something many of our competitors choose to ignore. For example, unfortunately, many of them still use the same rectangular pixel CCD that's used for video. And because this rectangular system has to be converted, the quality of the pictures inevitably suffer. The Dimâge V on the other hand, has its very own 350k square pixel CCD, which means your pictures can be transferred to your computer with absolute minimal loss of image quality. And the Dimâge V unlike most other digital cameras has a removable SmartMedia Compact Memory Card. Allowing all your shots to be stored on any number of cards. So you're not limited by a finite built-in memory. Other cameras have to store the information by massively compressing the data with a resultant loss of picture quality. The Dimâge V's 2MB card will hold sixteen 'fine' images or forty 'standard' and there's an optional 4MB card available. And because the cards are removable, there's absolutely no limit to the number of shots you can take and store. And all you need to take advantage of this amazing little camera is a PC (running Windows 95) or a Mac, with 16MB of RAM and CD Rom drive. And when you buy a Dimâge V you get absolutely everything you need to hook up to your PC or Mac and download your pictures. All this in a digital camera that costs just £599.99 including VAT. It's available at most good camera retailers so you won't need a roving eye to track one down. Just a finger to ring freephone 0800 731 6810 for the name of the one nearest to you.

Rabbi calls for end to Holocaust memorial day

Desire to commemorate the Holocaust is so acute that Jews have a special day set aside on which to do so. A leading rabbi fears that the day will eventually go by the board. But, as Clare discovered, his proposed alternative did not go down well.

A leading Reform rabbi yesterday suggested that, after the millennium, British Jews should abandon their special day commemorating the Holocaust and amalgamate it with their general day of mourning.

In a lecture, entitled "A time to be courageous and live dangerously," at the Festival of Reform Judaism, Rabbi Dr Jonathan Romain, of Maidenhead Synagogue, in Berkshire, argued that the Holocaust should be commemorated as the latest in a series of Jewish disasters rather than a unique event in its own right.

At present, Jews observe Yom HaShoah, a special day officially established by the Israeli parliament in 1951 and informally built into the Jewish religious calendar to commemorate the Holocaust. Since 400BC, all Jews have observed Tishah B'Av, a day of mourning for the destruction of the first and second Temples in Jerusalem. The latter has also been used to commemorate later tragedies such as the massacre in York in 1190 and the expulsion of Jews from Spain in 1492.

Rabbi Romain, the son of a Holocaust survivor, argued that since previous generations had added liturgies and elegies to the Tishah B'Av service, this generation should incorporate the Holocaust. "Tishah B'Av has almost become a magnet for black events in Jewish history, a repository of mourning. Although the Holocaust is a modern black event, it is just yet another in that long, black list." He said he feared that the special Holocaust memorial day would not stand the test of time. "One gets such small turnouts at the Armistice parade. Very few people stand to attention at 11am. Unfortunately, I think the same sort of thing is going to happen with the Holocaust."

William D Rubinstein, professor of history at the University of Wales and author of The Myth of Rescue, believes that any move to make the Holocaust part of a wider memorial day would be unpopular with Jews. "The Holocaust was such a traumatic, central event in modern Jewish history that if anything there is more of a desire to commemorate it, not less. It's more real to modern people than events of biblical times."

Rabbi Tony Bayfield, chief executive of the Reform Synagogues of Great Britain, said: "As far as the Reform Movement ... is concerned, the issue is not tabled as one for discussion. We will continue to mark the Shoah (Holocaust) on a special day."

"The Way I read a Letter's this"

By Emily Dickinson

The Way I read a Letter's - this -
Tis first - I lock the Door -
And push it with my Fingers - next -
For transport it be sure -

And then I go the furthest off
To counteract a knock -
Then draw my little Letter forth
And slowly pick the lock -

Then - glancing narrow, at the Wall -
And narrow at the floor
For firm Conviction of a Mouse
Not exorcised before -

Peruse how infinite I am
To no one that You - know -
And sigh for lack of Heaven - but not
The Heaven God bestow

Cabaret adds dash of decadence to feast of words

A display of Nineties decadence and a lament for lost English identity made contrasting climaxes to the Gloucestershire festival, witnessed by David Lister, Arts News Editor.

CHELtenham LITERARY FESTIVAL SPONSORED BY THE INDEPENDENT

A three-hour-long Decadence Cabaret at Cheltenham town hall saw readings and playlets from the racier side of British fiction. There were prose readings from Will Self, a play about Oscar Wilde, a "decadent cookbook" and even "decadent conjuring".

And the poet Fiona Pitt-Kethley recited verse about her experiences dressing up as a man to tour brothels and sex clubs in the East. "I couldn't do much, but it was fascinating to see who I would have fancied had I been a man," she said. "Everyone should try cross dressing at least once. The whole experience is different - just, for example, the way you are treated in the street."

The festival director, John Walsh, said decadence tended to rear its head at the fin de siècle, both in this century and the last. Yet by contrast, down the road at the Everyman Theatre, Melvyn Bragg in the Festival Lecture was advocating a very different set of values.

Bragg sounded most unlike a prominent left-leaning media figure and unlike most of his fellow novelists on the London literary scene - at one point he reminded his audience that British soldiers had been feared the world over since the 12th century. Arguing in an intriguing lecture that the historical novel had been too long neglected by the literati, he said it helped us as a nation rediscover our identity, an identity which had been battered because we had been strongly ashamed of our past. We were embarrassed and confused, he said, drawing parallels between 20th century discomfort with the historical novel and late 20th century unease with our own history and identity.

Bragg, a writer of historical novels as well as presenter of LWT's The South Bank Show and BBC Radio 4's Start The Week, told his audience at Cheltenham's Everyman Theatre: "English history recently has usually been recorded as a matter of shame and dishonour. But history, English history, can reinvigorate fiction and help us to make sense of the past."

In the last 50 years, he said, historical novels had been seen as a downmarket genre "with Georgette Heyer instead of Dickens, Catherine Cookson instead of Hardy". But now there was a resurgence with the likes of Rose Tremain, Pat Barker, Barry Unworthy and AS Byatt writing within the genre. "So they have come back," said Bragg. "Is there anything in the air or is it just a little splutter at the end of a tradition?"

He went on: "There might be a connection between the state of the country and the state of the novel. We all show the mantra of the decline of Britain, and end of Empire, end of British domination of the English language and political break-up at the United Kingdom.

There's a great sense in our country that we are looking to our enormous past to see what bits we are going to use, what we are going to build on. Not so much who we are, but who we were and more importantly who do we want to be. That accounts for the burst of serious writers in the last 10 or 15 years taking up the genre.

"Also I think a lot of people of my generation ... are realising that we have been on a strange historical journey. I'm 58. I was brought up in a little town that was much more like a Victorian town it is today ... In 1946 I still dealt in farthings as my grandfather did. Money wasn't all that different. Now it's gone out of all proportion.

"When I was a child I was surrounded by people who were innocent, who had satisfaction with their lot and had humility. I haven't encouraged that since I went to London."

British stars win all roles

The production company behind The English Patient is backing a new 'British' film. And, as David Lister reports, it seems that British talent has beaten off Hollywood opposition.

The British actress Jane Horrocks, best known for playing dippy secretary Bubble in the BBC's Absolutely Fabulous series, appears to have beaten off the claims of Hollywood star Gwyneth Paltrow, and will recreate her most famous stage role for the screen.

Shooting starts today in Scarborough on The Rise and Fall of Little Voice, based on Jim Cartwright's West End comedy. It is being financed by Miramax, the American independent production company which was behind the Oscar-winning movie The English Patient, and is jointly produced with British company Scala Films.

Last year the project was at the heart of trans-Atlantic crossfire, when it emerged that Gwyneth Paltrow, star of Emma and Seven, was also being touted to play the working-class Yorkshire girl with an astonishing gift for impersonation.

However, the British have won the day. When shooting begins today Horrocks will play "Little Voice". Brenda Blethyn, star of Mike Lee's Secrets and Lies, will play her overbearing mother - a role also at one time likely to go to an American - and Michael Caine, Ewan McGregor and Jim Broadbent will co-star in an all-British cast. The director is Mark Herman, who directed Brassed Off, the story of a colliery brass band.

No one at Miramax would discuss what casting negotiations had taken place, but sources say it was felt that the story of a back-street Cinderella in a bleak British seaside town would have seemed curious played by Hollywood superstars.

The story centres on a shy and quirky young woman who never goes out of the house. In her bedroom she repeatedly plays vintage records and perfects vocal imitations of Judy Garland, Marlene Dietrich, Marilyn Monroe and Shirley Bassey. A small-time agent hears about her and tries to make his and her fortune. The West End show also included Horrocks doing imitations of Cilla Black, which might also have confounded a Hollywood cast and audience.

Charlie Whelan: Went further than the Chancellor in ruling out early entry to Europe

Gordon and Charlie show put the City in a spin

Tories called for an inquiry into who was responsible for fuelling expectations of Britain's early entry into the European single currency. Colin Brown, Chief Political Correspondent, examines whether the 'spinning' was out of control.

All governments use "spin doctoring", but with the tenth anniversary of the stock market crash today, the "spinning" on the single currency risked getting seriously out of hand. With the market in a febrile state, it needed only a spark to set the City alight.

The spinning - brought to a high art by Labour in Opposition - did not matter with issues such as the replacement of the Royal Yacht Britannia: first it was to be rescued, then it was to be sunk. But the uncertainty in the financial markets could put at risk fortunes in pension funds.

The spinning began with an article in the Financial Times on 26 September reporting that the Cabinet was moving closer to early entry into the single currency. That sparked a flurry of buying and selling in the City, with a record stock market rise of 160 points, and a fall in the value of the pound by 4 pence to DM2.8. At a time when manufacturers were worried at the rising pound hitting exports, it seemed like a masterstroke. But Tony Blair was alarmed as the expectations continued to build of an early entry into EMU.

There have been attempts to blame "pro-European ministers outside the decision-making loop" - the Times on 18 October - but The Independent has no doubt that the Treasury was at least partly responsible.

One Treasury source said that there was no chance of Britain joining the single currency in the first wave in 1999, not least because of the practical difficulties of the euro. But having ruled out joining in the first wave, the source said the mood in the Cabinet had changed. "Robin Cook is now more pro-Euro than Gordon Brown", and there was a strong feeling in favour of early entry after the first wave. The big problem, the source said, was ensuring that Britain retained influence in Europe, while staying outside EMU for the first few years. That was why the Government was holding off making a statement.

The momentum for early entry was stepped up by an article in the Daily Mail on 13 October saying that Tony Blair would use the opportunity of a European summit in Luxembourg on 21 November to announce the decision to join "as soon as possible" after the 1999 first wave.

The alarm bells were now ringing loudly in No 10. The Prime Minister held three meetings with the Chancellor last week, culminating in Mr Brown's "U-turn" in his interview in the Times. The first meeting was last Monday at Downing Street, after Mr Blair returned from his trip to Northern Ireland. The next day, The Independent ran a report accusing the Treasury of trying to bounce Mr Blair into a decision to enter EMU, under the headline: "Dropping the Pound? Blair, Brown clash on the biggest issue of all."

The Treasury was furious and suspicious that it may have come from Mr Blair's aides, in retaliation at Mr Brown's drive for entry. The Treasury sources prepared the ground, dropping hints during the week for the brakes to be slammed on the momentum by the weekend. The crucial meeting came on Thursday night at No 10, when the Chancellor presented Mr Blair with the results of the Treasury's five-month study of EMU entry, concluding that to enter in the first wave the Government might have to slash public spending by £20bn or raise taxes by an equivalent amount - roughly 10p in the £ on the standard rate of income tax - which was totally unacceptable.

They agreed that expectations had to be damped down, and Mr Brown was given the task of performing the U-turn in an interview. He avoided making any commitment in his directly quoted remarks to rule out entry to the single currency for the lifetime of this Parliament, but again it was left to the "spin doctors" - his aide, Charlie Whelan - to inform journalists that the Treasury had no problem with the headline: "Brown rules out single currency for lifetime of this Parliament".

Information chiefs, who have been axed for failing to do their jobs effectively, could be forgiven for relishing the spectacle of the ministerial spin doctors getting into a spin. But the shareholders may come to blame the spinners, if the value of their savings is slashed today.

Gordon Brown: Given the task of making the U-turn on joining Europe in a newspaper interview

Minister drops TV appearance after complaining about Whitehall smears

David Clark, the Public Services Minister, cancelled a BBC interview yesterday after claiming there was a Whitehall smear campaign against him. Colin Brown says there are suspicions that his complaint was more than a "perforated eardrum".

David Clark looked set for the axe in the next Cabinet reshuffle by Tony Blair. Mr Clark, who is regarded by some colleagues as highly likeable but ineffective on the front bench, had a recurrence of a problem with his eardrum on a return flight from New Zealand last week.

BBC sources said he told the producers of the Sunday BBC programme On the Record at 8pm on Saturday, when news was breaking that he had claimed he was the victim of a smear campaign by "someone in the Government" to undermine his Cabinet position. "It was more than convenient," said the BBC source.

Mr Clark's allegations were seen as an attack on Peter Mandelson, the minister without portfolio, who is widely expected to get his job in the reshuffle, and to have been questioned about them could have been highly embarrassing for the Government.

The claims were seen by ministerial colleagues as a sign that Mr Clark was losing his fight to keep his job. Colleagues of Mr Clark privately said he had become alarmed by continued reports that he would be given the axe: "He's like a scared rabbit caught in the headlights," said one minister.

Mr Clark's office yesterday insisted that he was not accusing Mr Mandelson. He is blaming civil servants of being behind a spate of recent stories that Mr Clark spent about £50,000 on three fact-finding visits, flying first class while advisers went in economy, to the United States, Canada and Australasia to compare international freedom of information laws.

Another recent press report referred to the minister having lost some of his baggage on one trip - information which could only have been known to a few officials in his department.

Dr Clark told the Journal newspaper in Newcastle yesterday: "I can virtually prove these stories were planted by someone in the Government."

He then told the local BBC radio station: "I don't think there's any doubt that there is somebody running a smear campaign against me. The media has considerable detail, basically much of it true."

"Somebody somewhere is digging out information and giving it to the press."

Later one of his aides said: "This is quite specialised information and there was only a small number of people who could have known about it."

"He has a very good relationship with his civil servants, but civil servants would be the first to accept that official information should not be used or abused in any way which can be seen to undermine his work."

Peter Kilfoyle, the minister at the Office of Public Service, who stood in for Mr Clark on the programme, denied that Mr Clark had been "got at" after implying that Mr Mandelson was behind the press leaks. An investigation into Mr Clark's claim was being carried out by the permanent secretary in the department, Robin Mountfield.

Learning to listen: Leeds primary school children take a coffee break during counselling training at the Skale Hotel. Teachers believe the scheme is enjoyable, as well as helping pupils to gain confidence and learn to respect each other. Photograph: Joan Russell/Guzelian

A shoulder to cry on, aged 10

Children as young as ten are being trained to listen to the worries of seven- and eight-year-old fellow pupils. Esther Leach visited one of the Leeds primary schools conducting an unusual experiment.

It gives child psychology a new meaning. "Peer support" lessons are used to help 10-year-olds develop skills in listening and giving support to younger children who may be worried about making friends, their school work or getting on with their parents.

Adrianne Harker, head of one of four primary schools taking part in the £5,000 scheme in Leeds, said the children chosen for training had already showed signs of having the necessary skills.

She added: "Parents have told us how pleased they are their children have been chosen to help other children."

"There is no question that they will become overburdened with the worries of the children they are trying to help because we, the teachers, will always be there in the background." Groups of up to six children will meet without a teacher for 20 minutes a week over 10 weeks to discuss anything bothering them.

Laura Ward, 10, sipping coffee during a break in training at the Skale Hotel, Leeds said: "It's because we are kids we can help other kids. I expect the kind of thing we'll talk about is how to make friends or maybe how to get on with teachers and that kind of thing."

"If it's something very serious then we will go to a teacher for help. We have learnt how important it is to keep a confidence but if it is serious then we will go to a teacher."

Mark Mitchings, 10, said he expected to carry on giving help when he moved up to high school where peer counselling already goes on.

"I don't think I'd give it up as I got older for the sake of other things. It's a good thing to learn how to talk and listen to other people and I'll be learning all that while I'm helping other children."

"I think if someone told me they were smoking or drinking just because their parents did it, I'd tell them it was bad for them and that they ought to tell their parents it is bad for them too."

Training co-ordinator Dave Weetman said peer support went on in many high schools but this was the first scheme among primary school children. "This can work as an anti-bullying measure - a chance for children to talk out anything in a non-threatening way."

"And they are having fun too, as well as gaining confidence and learning to respect each other."

Mr Weetman said the idea emerged during discussions among the Seacroft-Manston Family of Schools in East Leeds, which is made up of a number of schools that work together and share resources.

Help in devising the training programme, during which children are taught the importance of eye contact and listening attentively, came from the CCDU Training Research and Consultancy Group based in Leeds University.

Peer support lessons are expected to start in the four primary schools after half-term.

Hollywood stirs a revolution in the history department literature is not confined to Scots. At Edinburgh, where the Celtic department is one of the fastest-growing in the university, English, French, Germans, Eastern Europeans and Americans are all keen to join in.

Academics give several reasons for the revival. Dr Ken Simpson, director of the centre for Scottish Cultural Studies at Strathclyde, said: "Braveheart may well have given a focus to some people with vague nationalist sentiments. Here was a very lively portrayal of a traditional Scottish hero." But he and others agree that the roots of the change lie much deeper. Dr Cairns Craig, a senior lecturer in the English literature department at Edinburgh, believes they can be traced back to the defeat for devolution in 1979. It inspired a number of Scottish academics to devise ways of encouraging Scottish culture in universities. "A key date was the 1987 election which showed that Scotland and England

William Wallace and Robert Bruce are now attracting more students than the French Revolution. At Stirling, the history department is putting on two instead of one first-year courses in Scottish history.

Numbers on a first-year Scottish history course offered at Aberdeen university are up this year from 70 to 120. Glasgow's growing numbers, almost double since the beginning of the decade, include large numbers of mature students. Stirling has recently added two Scottish history specialists to cope with the demand.

The revival is not confined to history. Scottish literature departments are also pulling in more students than ever before. At Edinburgh university, first and second-year courses, which would have attracted only 40 or so students 10 years ago, are this year catering for 200. There is also a new Scottish literature component which forms part of the honours degree programme.

At Strathclyde, there are 80 in the first-year Scottish literature course compared with 44 last year. There is also a new part-time postgraduate diploma for teachers. Students at both universities study the whole range of Scottish literature, from Dunbar and Henryson to modern writers such as Ian Crichton-Smith, William McEwan and Alison Kennedy.

The enthusiasm for Scottish history and were on politically divergent paths. There was a feeling that you couldn't do much politically but you could do something culturally."

Dr Simpson also sees the role of the Thatcher government in alienating Scots as one key to the cultural revival which has marched hand in hand with nationalism. Several academics believe that the recent vote in favour of devolution and the latest developments in universities are a sign that the Scots have come of age. Dr Fiona Watson, a lecturer in history at Stirling, said:

"Instead of just going on about the Braveheart myth people want to find out what it was really like. It is a sign of a mature society." Dr Simpson said that there was new sense of internationalism, that Scotland was a small nation within Europe. "Scots are beginning to discover links between Scotland and Europe which go back to the Middle Ages."

US women war veterans finally have their day

Some 30,000 turned out in Washington at the weekend to help inaugurate the Women in Military Service for America Memorial. As Mary Dejevsky reports, everyone agrees the memorial is late, but how late is a matter of opinion.

"At long last," said the Washington Post - whose uneasy role as Washington's local and the country's national newspaper was entirely appropriate to this occasion - "the women who served receive recognition." No one can say, either, that the recognition is grudging.

Standing at the very entrance to the Arlington National Cemetery, it incorporates an exhibition gallery, a theatre and an education centre, all designed to illustrate the contribution of America's women to war. The complex - which has something of a sprawling hacienda, something, with its vast reflecting pool, of a huge mosque - cost more than $20m, all of it raised by voluntary contributions.

Partly, it seems, to make up for lost time, partly not to offend anyone, the memorial is all-encompassing. It commemorates women who served their country not just in the two world wars of this century and the subsequent wars - Korea, Vietnam, the Gulf - in which Americans fought, but all wars, from the American Revolution onwards. It celebrates all women - an estimated 1.8 billion - who wore a uniform, whether they made the tea or navigated a plane.

Looking at the happy faces of those present at Saturday's ceremony, from fresh-faced young air force recruits to women veterans in their nineties, no one would have been churlish enough to question any aspect of the monument, particularly not its purpose.

Architecturally, it received a flattering press, which contrasted with the distinctly mixed reviews of the last - and considerably more striking - memorial to be opened in Washington: the Roosevelt monument that opened earlier this year.

A woman's place: Second World War veteran Norine Russel joins the celebrations on Saturday Photograph: AFP

Some visitors wore T-shirts saying "We also served". Young women were quoted as saying that it encouraged them to consider a military career, and Vice-President Al Gore was sent to say: "Thank you.

Thank you, for what you have done."

Even as the monument opened, however, it felt already just a little dated. Ten years ago, it would have been in harmony with American feminism at its most ebullient; five years ago it could have celebrated the opening of equal opportunities for women in the forces, even to combat roles. Now, however, the women's movement is quietly retrenching. One consequence of equal opportunities in the armed forces has been a series of lurid sexual harassment cases and the asking of some hard questions about the effects of "mixed" training. The new monument may tell the next generation of women what their "mommy did in the war", but it may also turn out to be a monument frozen in time. If the US fights another war, its servicewomen will need no separate commemoration. Their casualties will be ranged alongside the men, in military cemeteries across America.

Fury at Kohl's vow to stay until 2002

Chancellor Helmut Kohl faced a fresh barrage of dissent from the ranks of his Christian Democrats (CDU) yesterday over his pledge to rule Germany until 2002 if he wins next year's general election.

In an impromptu announcement last week, Mr Kohl, 67, who had already said he intended to stand for a record fifth term in the September 1998 poll, quashed speculation he might step down in mid-term, saying he would serve all four years.

Mr Kohl has already become Germany's longest serving chancellor this century by leading his centre-right coalition government since 1982. Staying until 2002 would take him past the 19 years that "Iron Chancellor" Otto von Bismarck served in the last century without having to face the inconvenience of elections.

The CDU deputy parliamentary leader, Heiner Geissler, welcomed Mr Kohl's public announcement of long-time heir apparent Wolfgang Schäuble. But he criticised Mr Kohl's intention to cling on to power for another five years.

Members of a loose grouping of ambitious CDU backbenchers and regional leaders known as the "Young Wild Bunch" chimed in, reiterating their demand for Mr Kohl to step aside earlier to make way for fresh blood at the top.

Mr Kohl, often dubbed the "eternal chancellor", told ZDF television in Germany he was convinced his whole election team had a winning ticket. He dismissed speculation that the CDU might form a grand coalition with the opposition Social Democrats if its junior partners, the Free Democrats (FDP), fail to gain at least 5 per cent of the votes, as required under election rules, to return to the Bonn parliament, as predicted by polls.

"I will not form a grand coalition. I do not predict this to be the (election) result," Mr Kohl said, adding that this was also the view of Mr Schäuble, who is the CDU's parliamentary group leader in Bonn.

Speculation about a grand coalition was prompted after Mr Kohl announced Schäuble would be his successor last week.

Mr Schäuble, confined to a wheelchair since a 1990 assassination attempt when a deranged man shot him, has toyed with the idea of such an alliance in the past. — Reuters, Bonn

Hamas chief calls for unity in war with Israel

Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, the founder of the militant Muslim organisation Hamas, appealed to all Palestinians yesterday to join ranks and direct their hostility at Israel.

"We insist that our people will remain unified in facing the American and Israeli conspiracies that want us to kill each other," he told Palestinian lawmakers at the Legislative Council headquarters in Gaza. "We will not transform our battle to an internal battle."

"We will be unified with the Palestinian National Authority... even if we were repressed by our brothers, we will not face repression with repression."

"We will not direct our hostility towards the Authority because our hostility is only directed towards the one enemy which has seized our land and killed our women, children and elderly."

Hamas, which opposes the peace deals the Palestinian president Yasser Arafat has made with Israel, has killed scores of Israelis in suicide bombings.

Last month the Palestinian Authority, under pressure from Israel and the United States, arrested Hamas activists and closed 16 of its charity and educational institutions.

Sheikh Yassin was released from an Israeli jail earlier this month as part of a prisoner swap with Jordan after a bungled attempt by Israeli intelligence agents to assassinate Khaled Meshal, a Hamas leader in Amman. Sheikh Yassin, arrested in 1989, was serving a life sentence in Israeli jails.

He was quoted as saying at the weekend: "Israel, as the Jewish state, must disappear from the map."

"We are now weak but in the future we will be strong. They [Israel] are today strong but in the future they will be weak."

The cleric said Hamas would continue fighting Israel until it ended its occupation of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, including Arab East Jerusalem - all land where he says Palestinians want to set up an independent state.

● A roadside bomb blast yesterday killed two Lebanese who were travelling in a car near Jezzine, an area controlled by the pro-Israeli South Lebanon Army (SLA), Israeli security sources said.

According to initial reports the two in the car were Lebanese civilians or SLA members.

On Saturday, Hizbollah guerrillas killed an Israeli soldier when they fired on a tank at the edge of Israel's 9 mile-wide occupation zone in south Lebanon.

Kenyan police beat democracy protesters

Police fired bullets into the air, hurled tear-gas canisters and beat Kenyans with clubs yesterday in another violent crackdown on a pro-democracy rally in Nyeri, 93 miles north-west of Nairobi.

Thousands of demonstrators waving signs that said, "No reforms, no elections", defied orders to disperse. Within minutes, gunshots crackled through the air.

The National Convention Assembly had called the demonstration to demand the repeal of laws which it says would give President Daniel arap Moi an edge in elections later this year. Moi, 74, has ruled Kenya for 19 years and is seeking a fifth five-year term.

Solidarity agrees deal

Poland's Solidarity-led AWS bloc and the smaller Freedom Union (UW) party agreed yesterday on the share-out of government posts, moving closer to a final coalition deal after weeks of talks, a senior UW leader said.

Tadeusz Strykowski said a coalition agreement setting common policy goals and spelling out the share-out of government positions could be signed later.

On Friday the two partners clinched a deal, which allowed President Aleksander Kwasniewski to designate prime minister Jerzy Buzek, a 57-year-old academic, as a joint candidate of the AWS and the Freedom Union.

Lisbon subway fire kills two

A fire in the Lisbon subway last night killed two and caused major damage to the track and a station, officials said. The subway was closed at the time.

Rescue services found the dead bodies of a security guard and a station chief who were on duty below ground at the time of the blaze, the fire chief Jose Lameirinhas said. Neither of the men was named. About 60 firemen wearing oxygen masks fought the blaze, which broke out after the subway system had shut down for the night.

Pope honours St Therese

The Pope bestowed one of the Catholic Church's highest honours yesterday on St Therese of Lisieux, the 19th-century French nun known as the "Little Flower".

In an elaborate ceremony in St Peter's Square, the pontiff made her a doctor of the church, a title given to selected saints whose writings or teachings are considered to have outstanding merit. A huge, flower-bedecked portrait of St Therese, who died of tuberculosis in 1897 aged 24 and was canonised just 28 years later, hung in the square. Therese ended her short life in the convent in Lisieux. "I did not think it was possible to suffer so much," she said toward the end.

Smears mar election in Montenegro

Montenegrins voted yesterday at the end of a presidential election campaign in which the Yugoslav republic's two top political leaders smeared each other with accusations of massive corruption.

The early turnout was heavy, after an indecisive first round two weeks ago when the outgoing President, Momir Bulatovic, edged reformist Prime Minister Milo Djukanovic, by just 2,500 votes.

Mr Bulatovic's strong showing surprised Mr Djukanovic, who had expected to cruise to victory after sidelining his former ally and taking control of the state apparatus during a year of political infighting.

Diplomats said the credibility of both men had been badly damaged by corruption charges, involving millions of dollars.

The criminality issue, which Bulatovic also exploited during the first round, struck a chord with voters who saw a class of new rich emerge during the black market era that flourished during UN sanctions against Yugoslavia.

The corruption dispute overshadowed the political stakes between Mr Bulatovic, the candidate of Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic, and Mr Djukanovic who has led a drive to liberalise the republic's economy.

Yemen abduction threatens to ruin leader's tour of West

The Yemeni government yesterday sealed off the area where kidnapped Briton Henry Thompson is being held. Patrick Cockburn in Sanaa reports on the fury over what officials see as a politically motivated act.

Tribesmen kidnapped Henry Thompson, a Briton conducting research work for the Japan International Cooperation Agency, as he drove north along the main road linking Sanaa to the south of the country.

The kidnappers, belonging to the Bani Zabyan tribe, then took him 70 miles east to their stronghold south of the city of Marib. Yesterday, the government said it had sealed off the area with about 100 soldiers, enough to practice thousands of troops would be needed for the government to assert its authority in a region which is under tribal control.

The Yemeni Interior Ministry, which is trying to mediate Mr Thompson's release, has received a letter from him in which he says he is being "well treated, well fed and is comfortable". He added that the tribesmen had kidnapped him and his Yemeni translator because they want a better water supply, a clinic and an improved road to their district.

More than 30 foreigners, mainly Italian, French and German tourists, have been kidnapped in Yemen this year. But Mr Thompson is the first Briton to be abducted for several years. All the others were released unharmed.

In seeking Mr Thompson's release the Yemeni government appears to be following its usual practice of arresting any members of the tribe it can lay its hands on and sealing off the area's few main roads.

There were already signs of this happening at the weekend on the road from Sanaa to Marib. We passed through one army checkpoint after much argument and a suggestion from the soldiers that we get the police to act as bodyguards. But at a second checkpoint, on the road to Jihana, one of Yemen's main gun markets, and not far from where Mr Thompson is held, the officer in charge refused to let us pass. When we asked for two soldiers as guards he said they would not be enough.

He had about 40 men guarding his post as well as two pick-up trucks with heavy machine guns in the back. "There are many problems beyond here between the government and the tribes. Perhaps you will get hijacked," he said.

In Sanaa, the Ministry of Information, which had previously said we could visit any part of Yemen, refused a permit even to visit Jihana, though this used to be on many tourist itineraries.

Yemen is angry about the Thompson case because Ali Abdullah Saleh, the Yemeni president, is to pay his first official visit to Britain on 11 November. Dr Abdul Karim al-Eryani, the Foreign Minister, told The Independent yesterday that the kidnapping of Mr Thompson was politically motivated. "The social grievances are camouflage," he said. "I have never heard of anybody demanding development aid for their region through kidnapping."

Most Yemeni officials believe that the abductions are orchestrated by the Yemeni opposition, which is funded by outside powers. In 1994 Yemen was the scene of a civil war when the south, supported by Saudi Arabia, tried to secede.

Desperate nation prepares to defy might of Peking

Tibetan exiles say they have 10 years to save their culture from extinction at the hands of the Chinese. Now they plan a campaign of civil disobedience which may be their last chance in an uneven fight.

"Every year, in Tibet," said Samdhung Rinpoche, the monk and reincarnate lama who is leader of the Assembly of Tibetan People's Deputies, the Tibetan parliament in exile, "there is less of Tibetan language, culture and religion. Every year, His Holiness the Dalai Lama is a year older. Time is certainly running out."

The Dalai Lama has renewed his appeal to the Chinese government to re-open a dialogue with him that has been in abeyance since 1989. Since then, there have been sporadic, unfruitful contacts, exchanges of correspondence and messages relayed through third parties. None have advanced the Dalai Lama's hopes that one day he might reach an accommodation with China over autonomy for the country he fled as a young man in 1959.

Now the Dalai Lama is 61 and well aware, as is his community in exile, that he cannot wait for ever. In a desperate attempt to provoke change, Samdhung Rinpoche has decided to initiate a campaign of civil disobedience inside Tibet, modelled on Mahatma Gandhi's satyagraha - the non-violent campaign against British rule in India.

It is not just his own mortality that adds urgency to the Dalai Lama's appeal for dialogue and gives the Chinese the advantage in this unequal contest. In the nearly 40 years since the uprising that led to the Dalai Lama's flight, Tibet has been battered by disasters authored by the Chinese occupation. In the Fifties and Sixties there was the crude expression of militant socialism - enforced collectivisation, starvation, labour camps and the destruction of religious life.

There was respite and even a Chinese apology in 1979. But the Eighties saw a revival of Tibetan nationalism and the Nineties have brought a renewed assault, this time through mass Chinese immigration. In the name of economic modernisation, the old city of Lhasa is being demolished and Tibet's traditions, her way of life and even her language are being eroded. Chinese immigrants have brought karaoke bars and brothels to the once holy city and political indoctrination to the tightly controlled monasteries.

"In 10 years," said Samdhung Rinpoche, "the Tibetan identity will be destroyed, if nothing changes. In the history of nations there have been many occupations, but usually they were confined to political power - like the British occupation of India. If India has regained her independence 50

Dialogue has never seemed a more distant prospect. Peking accuses the Dalai Lama of fomenting the demand for Tibetan independence, despite his frequently repeated statements that autonomy is the exiles' goal.

"As far as the present situation goes," says Samdhung Rinpoche, "we acknowledge the occupation. It is a reality. We do not say that they must vacate Tibet, only that they are legitimising their rule by giving the Tibetan people some dignity and a chance to live their lives in their own language and practising their own spiritual heritage - which is of value to all humanity, not just Tibet. We want internal autonomy and a little breathing space."

The Tibetans see some hope for change in the tensions between consumerism and the totalitarian regime in China. "But the totalitarian regime is securely supported by Western powers, who do not want to jeopardise their business dealings with China," said Samdhung. "I think Western governments should be honest. If they like the Chinese way of governing, they should say so and stop talking about human rights. They should say clearly they care only for trading advantages."

The reality is that there is little the exiles can do, but desperation breeds desperate measures. Samdhung himself was born in Tibet in 1919 and has lived in exile since he was 20. He is well aware of the risks that his plan for civil disobedience poses.

"There is a difference between our situation and Gandhi's," he said. "Gandhi was fighting a civilised nation which had a rule of law and a parliament and it worked. May I think this plan is nothing but a suicidal effort, but we thought it worth trying. At the moment we are training the people who might take part, though it's difficult thing to accept that you might be imprisoned or even shot."

He adds: "Whatever me come, they will be dedicated non-violent activists. If we are going to disappear, let it be with some positive resistance. If we keep quiet it would amount to an acceptance and we, too, would be guilty."

years later, it would not have mattered to her way of life. But it we have to wait another 50 years, we will be an indistinguishable province of China."

"History is history," said Samdhung. "Our position is that we cannot rewrite history. How can a Buddhist lie about historical facts? To say Tibet was always a part of China is a lie."

Peking has initiated a new campaign against the Dalai Lama, banning his photograph from religious institutions and trying to discredit his religious authority inside Tibet. The dispute over the recognition of the eleventh Panchen Lama ended two years ago, with the disappearance of the Dalai Lama's candidate and the imposition of a Chinese boy.

In the West, an arcane but violent row over the Dalai Lama's ban on the worship of a Tibetan deity, Dorje Shugden, has led for the first time to a challenge to his authority by a dissident lama from within his own Gelug sect. Although the Dorje Shugden affair is largely confined to India and the West, it is a well-financed and persistent campaign, which many suspect is supported by Peking.

Americans prepare to give Jiang a rough welcome

Human rights groups and unions, environmentalists and anti-nuclear protesters, exiled Tibetans and religious leaders, have all promised they will punctuate Chinese President Jiang Zemin's trip to the United States next week with protests.

"The coalition is much broader than usual, reflecting a grass-roots disaffection with China," said John Ackerly of the International Campaign for Tibet. "I can guarantee it will be energetic."

President Jiang can expect to see evidence of that at every stop on his six-day tour, which starts in Hawaii on Sunday, reaches its climax with formal welcoming ceremonies, a 21-gun salute at the White House, and winds up with a speech at Harvard University.

China's policies on human rights, Tibet, Taiwan, trade, religious freedom, arms sales, nuclear proliferation and family planning have stirred strong emotions in the US. Many find the Chinese leader's proposed visit to Philadelphia's Liberty Bell, rung in 1776 to proclaim the separation of the colonies from Britain, and to Independence Hall, where the Declaration of Independence was adopted, particularly galling.

Jiang Zemin: 21-gun salute

"It's as if he's taking a victory lap of the United States after Tiananmen Square - it's almost like the Founding Fathers' tour," complained Abigail Abrash of the Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Center for Human Rights.

Ms Abrash is helping to coordinate a rally in Washington. Joining environmentalists, anti-nuclear activists, human rights proponents and unionists will be religious leaders, the conservative Family Research Council and even members of Mr Clinton's Democratic Party, who had demanded major progress in China before President Jiang was granted a state visit.

"The administration is preparing to give the President of China a red carpet welcome when hundreds, perhaps thousands, of political and religious dissidents are rotting in prison and Chinese authorities are carrying out massive human rights abuses in Tibet," complained Senator Russ Feingold, a Wisconsin Democrat.

The man who never put both feet wrong

DEBORAH ROSS TALKS TO
KEVIN KEEGAN

How big a legend can a small footballer be? Pretty big, especially if he chooses Liverpool and Newcastle as playing turf. They're dafter about soccer there than anywhere else. So then why would he leave? And what would make him sign up with Fulham and start all over again?

A lot of people can be quite snide about Kevin Keegan. He's had some rubbish hair-dos in his time, they say. He made it to Liverpool and, England, yes, but was never a truly great player. Anyone could have done what he did at Newcastle with that sort of money. If he does the same at Fulham, it'll only be because of Mohammed Al Fayed's got lots. He was England's first football millionaire and is as much interested in marketing himself as he is in the game. Certainly, he is still at this last. I must, he tells me, buy my son The Kevin Keegan Soccer Kit for Christmas. "You can get it at Sports Division, who've just taken over Olympus. It'll cost you around £30, but it comes in a good-quality bag which you can later use when you go shopping."

However, as far as the public go, he seems to be pretty much untouchable. An icon, even. Last Thursday I had gone to Westminster Central Hall to see him take questions from an audience while simultaneously promoting his just published autobiography – the imaginatively titled Kevin Keegan: My autobiography. The place was packed to capacity. At least 1,000 people, I would say. The evening was meant to finish at 9pm but Kevin had to stay until midnight signing copies of his book. The queue went out the hall, down the grand staircase and into the street.

I find him quite charismatic myself. He is very open and, maybe even, a good deal wiser than most footballers. He has never really come a cropper, not even in his personal life. He's never fallen out of night-clubs at dawn or dated poppies. He has been married to Jean, his teenage sweetheart, for as long as anyone can remember. No, he doesn't wish he was a footballer today just so he could date a Posh or Ulrika and Danni. Although, that said, he was seated between Ulrika and Danni at an awards do recently. And? Could you have scored if you'd have wanted to, so to speak? "No. I don't think so. They like big centre forwards. I'm just not their type."

Certainly, he is really quite dishy, with that dimpled chin and the very thick, now silver hair which may be naturally bouffant but then again may have been blow-dried. Whatever, it's a vast improvement on that perm. What was he thinking of there? Well, he says, long hair was fashionable in the Seventies and he couldn't be bothered with all the blow-drying after showers so that's why he had it. He then adds that the first time Jean saw it "she made me go to the bathroom and dampen it down." But, still, you kept on having perms, didn't you. "Yes, because once you start it is very difficult to stop. Terry Mac's still having them. We can't wean him off. We call him Don King."

Terry Mac is Terry McDermott, his former Liverpool team-mate who he brought along as his assistant when he joined Newcastle as manager. Everyone laughed at them, he says. "Here I was, a bloke who'd been playing golf in Marbella for eight years and here was Terry, a bloke who'd been selling hamburgers at race courses for nine years."

Of course, the more Kevin was goaded the more he was determined. I think this is what makes him tick, actually. Indeed, I reckon he is actually more excited by endeavour and overcoming odds than he is in actual achievement, which is probably just as well at the moment because he is not playing for Liverpool or England or boasting Newcastle. He is the Chief Operating Officer of Fulham.

So, Friday morning finds him at Motspur Park in south London, and the BBC's sports club where the Fulham football squad – nice boys with nice legs in nice shorts but who spit a bit too much for my liking – are training this morning. When I arrive, Kevin Keegan is already out there, urging his players on. "I want to see silky soccer," he is crying. "You're passing, which is great lads, but let's have some end product – end product!"

"Hello Kevin," I shout from the other side of the pitch with a little wave. He waves back politely. "Do you want me in goal?" I then shout, because I believe in making myself useful when I can. "We're not that bad yet," he shouts while making little shooping motions with his hands.

I think this very unkind and short-sighted of him, particularly as I'd got up especially early to do my warm-up exercises and am known to be good in goal so long as I remember to keep my legs together and don't have too many fags and move occasionally and try to keep awake.

So I'm left on the sidelines, with Kevin coming over ever now and for a chat between whoops of "well-played Darren. Love it. Love it!" Kevin, I say, these Fulham boys look very nice, and very keen and everything, and I'm sure all the spitting is no worse than you would find at another club, but they're hardly Shearers or Ferdinands or Ginolas, are they? I mean, doesn't it bother you, after what you became used to at Newcastle? "No," he replies. "Absolutely not. My interest is in improving players, whatever their ability."

There are not hundreds of idolators in attendance but two Fulham fans (yes, both of them) turn up out of curiosity to watch the training session. What do you think of Kevin? I ask. Their reply takes the form of sinking to their knees in the mud and getting all worshipful.

He was born in Doncaster, the son of Joe Keegan, a miner. Money was scarce so he was out there raising funds from an early age. He would go down Doncaster Market and collect the wooden boxes which he would then break up and sell door-to-door as firewood. Typically, he always handed the money straight over to his mother, Doris. He was always more interested in making it than having it.

He first became interested in football when his Uncle Frank happened to give him a ball. He practised all day every day. He passed the 11-plus and got into grammar school but didn't do well academically because he was always out there, practising. The first ever team he tried out for was Coventry. Jimmy Hill turned him down. Yes, he was extremely upset. Although as he now says: "If he'd said I was a good footballer, then I would have been worried." He was eventually signed by fourth division Souththorpe. "It was the sort of place where they announced the crowd changes to the team."

He went on to Liverpool, then increased his salary five-fold by playing for Hamburg in Germany and winning the European Player of the Year award twice. On his return, he played for Southampton and Newcastle, where Paul Gascoigne was his boot boy. "Great player, useless bootboy. He was always losing mine." He retired at 33, taking Jean and their two daughters to Spain where he played that golf for eight years. Yes, he was quite happy playing golf. Yes, he can live without football. Or at least did. Until he got bored. "One day, when I was standing ready to play a shot on the par-five twelfth over water, I suddenly realised I wasn't enjoying my golf anymore, but had no other purpose." So he returned to Newcastle. First as consultant. Then manager.

Then, after five years of ecologically supported, royally funded progress from the bottom of the second division to runner up in the first, he quit causing shock-horror on Tyneside Nobody could really understand it at the time except perhaps that the team always seem to stumble – fall apart even – at the final hurdle, just when they looked like winning something big. Was he just running away? Or, as people always tend to think when such things happen, were there horrible skeletons in the cupboard?

According to the version in his book, after five exhilarating but trophy free years at Newcastle, he became demotivated and, feeling he couldn't take the club any further, asked if he might go at the end of the 1996-7 season. The chairman, Sir John Hall, said he could do so and even, says Keegan, shook hands on it with him. But then, a couple of days later he was summoned before the board and told that, with the flotation coming up, he would either have to go now or sign for another two years. Anything else would be too damaging. "So, I reacted how Kevin would react. I went." Yes, he has spoken to Sir John Hall since, but only the once. "I called him about six weeks afterwards, just to say hello, really, because we had been very much a team at Newcastle. He seemed quite shocked to hear from me. He said he and Mae (his wife) would take me and Jean (Kevin's wife) out for dinner but he never did." The main grumble among Newcastle fans seems to be that none of this was explained to them at the time. One moment Kevin was there, and the next he was gone. "Why didn't you come onto the pitch and say something?" asks a Geordie at the Westminster evening. "Say I had," replies Kevin. "Say I'd come out and said sorry lads, Newcastle have finished with me. What would have happened?"

"There would have been a riot."

"A riot. Yes. Thank you." People are giving him a hard time about all this since he's made it public. Is Keegan bitter? No, he insists, he is not OK, he got booted out in the end. "OK, Newcastle never really won anything, but we played some stunning football and had a good crack at it." What happened happened. That's football for you. Plus, he made a £1m when Newcastle floated, which was nice, although he reckons he was worth more. "I do believe in paying people what they are worth. When I was at Liverpool and first went to see Bill Shankley about getting a rise from £80 to £100 a week, he said to me as soon as I walked in: 'You've done me proud son. I'm going to double your wages.' Yes, Shearer was very much worth £15m. I never had any regrets about that at all."

And, he adds, people forget the state Newcastle were in five years ago. On their uppers. Two weeks after he arrived this little, balding red-headed chap turned up at a training session. "Who are you?" asked Kevin. "I'm Billy Askew," he replied. "Yes, but who are you?" "I'm a Newcastle player." "Where have you been?" "I've been on loan to Mansfield." The next day he had to play Billy in a reserve match against Liverpool's reserve team where their manager Graeme Souness was bragging about his great young players. "See that boy, best scorer in the Irish youth team. See that one, best striker in the Scottish youth team." Then Billy Askew ran out. "He's bald," cried Souness. "No," said Keegan, "he just shaves his head to make him faster." What else could he say?

What does Keegan value most in the end? Effort and what they call in football "honesty". I ask him who he would have playing for him if he could sign up any three players this afternoon – regardless of price or whether they would be willing to come down to second division Fulham. Shearer, he says, "because he always does it for you, week in, week out." And Robert Lee and Tony Adams. "I don't know Tony, but I like what I see." Not Ginola, then? "Ginola could be the best player in the world," he replies, "but his trouble is he only likes running that way." Which way? "Towards goal. The only time he'll ever run the other way is after half time. But I could never resist playing him."

After Newcastle, Jean did not want him to take up with another team. They could have gone back to Spain. Or concentrated on the race horses they keep on their big estate in Newcastle. But Keegan could not resist the Fulham challenge. What is Chief Operations Manager, by the way? "I'm not the manager. Ray Wilkins is the manager. Yes, I'm responsible for everything that happens, but I don't have to go to every match or be there for every training session. If Jean phones me up to say the girls are missing me, I can go straight home." The family home is still in the north-east although Kevin is now renting somewhere down here. Jean comes down when she can.

Last week he took her to see Miss Saigon. "But I fell asleep during the helicopter bit, which is apparently quite hard to do." The great thing about football people is that they are really not interested in anything but football.

It's time to take a darned good look at your underwear collection

DINAH HALL

There's nothing quite like reading about other people's crotchless leopard print body suits to make one look afresh at one's underwear drawer. I've always regarded knickers as functional garments, and it seems to me – though I may be missing the point here – that if you are going to go crotchless you may as well go the whole hog and drop the knicker part as well. Never the less, mindful that my husband is coming up to that age when he might be most vulnerable to 18-year-olds in fancy combinations, I have been spurred to finally throw away all the tired grey undergarments that still bear my school name-tapes. (An awful waste, I agree, as I dare say there are a few Conservative MPs out there who could get quite worked up over baggy gym knickers – though probably only if they were wearing them themselves). It only occurred to me afterwards that it would probably have been just as effective and more economical to sew name-tapes into my husband's boxer shorts. Just a thought, Mrs Merchant.

Still on the subject of undies, an article in one of the Sunday newspapers by Anne Atkins, vicar's wife and beacon of moral certitude, attests to the power of stockings – she said that knowing what she was wearing underneath gave her the courage to face up to John Humphries. It's never too late for an old dog to change her spots is my motto, so knowing I was going to be at an opening of an exhibition in a furniture shop with Peter Mandelson – much more frightening than John Humphries – I heeded her words and put some fresh elastic in my M&S hip-huggers. A complete waste of effort – I only got near enough to observe that he is very thin and pasty, and looks like he could do with a good square meal. But I did meet some very nice members of his fan club wearing long robes and skeleton masks who said I could join if I wanted. Feeling this would compromise my loyalty to Gordon Brown (now there's a man who could carry off Cash's woven name-tapes down his backside without losing any of his manly prowess) I declined, while thoroughly agreeing with their sentiments that it is indeed "marvellous that a man like him can take time off to admire sofas."

And what a week for Royal socks. First we had Andrew's, and the darned if he does, darned if he doesn't question. Of course he does – mending socks and letting down hems is an important yardstick of traditional values and shows you've got enough money to pay someone to do it for you but are not vulgar enough to squander it. Then there's the poor Queen, having to wear those unflattering standard-issue blue ankle socks – yuck, just like when you're trying on shoes in a shoe shop with bare feet and they make you put on horrible American Tan pop socks that are still sweaty from the last person...

It's clear the Foreign Office really did bungle this trip – you would have thought they would have foreseen this and had some nice little slipperettes made by Patrick Cox.

I shall never again sneer at the people round here who order their croissants in French at the local café. I thought they were just showing off but clearly they are suffering from a recognised medical condition, Foreign Accent Syndrome. I'm not so convinced by that other topical disease – Peyronie's or "Wonky Willy" to Sun readers. According to Paula Jones, Clinton's member had a pronounced curve to it – either that or it was just looking behind her to check the door was closed.

It's for women, darling. Who did you think it was for?

Ready to wear? Hardly. The Paris prêt-à-porter features the usual waith-like models in outfits with no armholes. But there is recognisable human life on Planet Fashion. Tamsin Blanchard spotted it at the end of a long week exploring: 'Alexander McQueen, I presume.' Photographs by Ben Elwes.

Fashion designers tend to focus on young women whose breasts are high and perky, whose tummies are flat and free of spare tyres, and whose bottoms have not yet started on the inevitable descent to their ankles. Look at any designer's drawing and you would be forgiven for thinking he (or she - it's not just men) had been given an alien specimen to draw at life-drawing classes. The fashion figure, as taught at art school, is eight hands tall, rather than the seven hands reserved for normal human beings. She has a head the size of a pin-prick (no fashionable woman has more than one brain cell, you see), a short, narrow torso, and legs that would happily run along on into infinity. The only woman I have ever seen that confirmed to this shape is Jodie Kidd. If I were to be so foolish as to stand next to her, my head would reach her tiny waist. And even she has a bigger head than that on the end of a dressmaker's pin.

Last week, at the Paris prêt-à-porter, many designers seemed intent on re-arranging even their own freakish ideal. The fashion figure, as shown for spring/summer 1998, has arms growing out of the front of her body (that's if she has any arms at all) so that armholes fall at the front of a garment instead of at the sides, and shoulders and necklines are displaced left, right and centre.

The designers who were not sticking to the traditional human form as most of us know it, or even their own string-bean fantasy, were keen to push the shape of fashion in a new direction. For this, we can thank Rei Kawakubo of Comme des Garçons. For the past few seasons, Kawakubo has presented clothing with in-built bumps and humps, shoulders bunched up to the ears, and cocoons of fabric that drape around the body and encase the arms. We have laughed. But now her influence is everywhere. This season, her collection of fluid drapings and layer upon layer of fine fabric came almost exclusively in cream. She does not compromise. Nor does her protégé, Junya Watanabe. But he is not the only one to drape, pleat and wrap his way around the human form. Issey Miyake took a radical departure this season and presented a collection almost entirely of dresses that draped around the body - mostly more forgivingly than at Comme des Garçons - and sleeves without hand-holes. The collection reflected the other main theme of the week in its lightness and airiness. Fabrics were soft, either gauzy, iridescent synthetics or organically wrapped muslin. Martin Margiela, who showed in conjunction with Comme des Garçons, also displaced shoulders and necklines so as to distort them on the body, and rolled fabric in on itself to make a straightforward garment such as a knitted cardigan look weird and strangely wonderful. Or wonderfully strange. The Japanese and the Belgians are the main innovators and experimenters in Paris fashion. What they do seems awkward and odd, but inevitably those ideas eventually work their way into more mainstream clothing in some diluted form.

As for the designers who were happy with the conventional eight-hand fashion drawing, they wanted to show off the long, leggy, narrow form at every opportunity. Dresses have become so sheer and delicate as to be almost invisible. The best came from John Galiano, fresh from his Belle Époque Ladies at Dior. For his own small, 30-odd-piece collection, Galiano took over the 16th-century Château de Vincennes to hold a few magical moments of bohemian madness with Thirties Violet Elizabeth dresses in light dussings of tulle and embroidery, sugar plum fairies, lean, knitted columns and a whirling Sharon Harlow in raspberry rose dévoté so delicate, it looked as if it would disintegrate if you so much as sneezed on it.

The Australian designer Collette Dinnigan (her celebrity customers include Paula Yates, who watched the show), makes delicate lace dresses that need little imagination and even less modesty to wear. Likewise Chloe, where Stella McCartney used floaty chiffons and wispy silk for her take on the sort of clothes her mother used to wear in the Seventies and the sort that she likes to wear now. Alexander McQueen at Givenchy showed some cobweb-fine tulle dresses with intricate beadwork that appeared to have been sewn on to the skin, and Ann Demeulemeester showed back split white shirts so light and fresh they billowed out behind.

As we approach the beginning of the 21st century, fashion seems to get more and more directionless. It floats here, meanders there, and occasionally rises up in a great puff of smoke and evaporates into thin air. Chanel's collection was relaxed and at ease with itself, with cardigan jackets, slouchy suits, and dresses in candy-coloured tweed frayed at the edges. But it didn't tell us anything new. It took Alexander McQueen to bring the week firmly back to Planet Fashion with his gutsy, glitter-lipped, hair-flicked, cowgirl collection. Frilly, whimsical romance and swooning coquettes were hung by the wayside, to be replaced by hard shoulders, structured tailoring, and mixes of colour (orange, yellow, black and white all in one jacket) that would send most beige-, black- and baby-blue-clad fashion editors into bad taste trauma syndrome. This was not about pretty clothes, but good old, hard-edged fashion.

At times, the huesos rancheros were undoubtedly over-egged. There is only so much cowhide and fringing a girl can take. But what really shone out were the cut, the immaculate finish, and the ingenious way McQueen has of making fabric ride the body so cleverly, and yet apparently effortlessly. The collection, including inter-cut leather jackets, fringed dresses, silver-glitter-dusted Prince of Wales checks, jet fringing, delicate, punched-leather lace, Las Vegas showgirl dresses and the belted trouser-suits of the season, was upbeat, frivolous, funny, fun and wild, a bold voice shouting out in an increasingly ethereal fashion world.

Aldo Berni

Aldo Berni, restaurateur: born Bardi, Italy 14 March 1909; married 1947 Esme Clifton (died 1995; one daughter); died Bristol 12 October 1997.

As late as the 1980s, surveys regularly showed that Britain's favourite menu was prawn cocktail, steak and chips, and Black Forest gâteau. Aldo Berni was the caterer who first dished up the country's preferred meal, at his chain of Berni Inns.

We tend to forget how long rationing lasted after the Second World War: in fact, it only ended in 1954, with predictable consequences. A Devon landlord, quoted in the Good Food Guide for 1955-56, said: "The public went beef-mad in 1954". Berni and his older brother, Frank (now 95, and living in Jersey with his wife), were poised to take advantage of post-war steak-hunger. In 1943 they had bought their first licensed restaurant, Horts, characterised by Berni himself, as "the best-known restaurant in Bristol".

In the first edition of the Good Food Guide in 1951-52, Raymond Postgate described Horts as "historic, solid, comfortable; excellent service, real feeling for food and wines, and they give mammoth helpings... Speciality: oyster soup and Dover sole." Ten years later Horts had joined the rest of the Berni chain and specialised in steak and (as they were often euphemistically called) scampi. The chain evolved and grew until it comprised 147 hotels and restaurants, and in 1970 the Bernis sold it to Grand Metropolitan for £14.5 million. Its identity came not just from the food and the name "Berni Inn", but from the furnishings and decor: red velvet, stout wooden chairs and paper parrots for the puddings as well as the cocktails. It was a formula for financial success, because it brought industrialised catering to the restaurant. The cooking facilities needed were simply a central grill and a deep-fryer.

The limited menu - originally steak, chips, peas, bread roll and butter, and pudding or cheese for 7s 6d - meant that no trained chef was needed, and most of the normal kitchen brigade could be dispensed with. The only important member of staff was the manager who looked after the money and hired and fired the waiters. Still, eating out at a Berni Inn was a huge treat for the beef-starved masses, and the Berni brothers led the steak-house boom of the 1960s. Italians such as Lord Fortescue were prominent in post-war mass-catering, and it seems almost to have been the Berni brothers' destiny to have ended up with a food-service empire.

Aldo Berni came to Britain from Italy at the age of 16. His family were already settled in Wales, but his father had the brothers educated in Italy before sending for them to join the family business. Aldo went first to Wales and then moved to Exeter. When the Second World War came, Frank and another brother, Marco, were interned, but Aldo was called up. Rejected for military duties on medical grounds, he did war work at a nursery by day and by night ran the business - the family had a small chain of "about six" unlicensed restaurants in Bristol, Exeter, Gloucester and Plymouth.

In a 1990 interview in the Independent he stated that the Berni family "had long been caterers and are direct descendants of several of the kingpins behind the once vast network of Italian cafés, still known as the brucchi, throughout the Welsh mining valleys." Aldo Berni claimed that his grandfather, John, had emigrated from Bardi to Wales in 1862, and settled in Merthyr Tydfil. He said that "the whole colony of Italians in Wales were originally brought over by the Bernis," and that, "before the First War, the Bernis had 48 refreshment bars in south Wales. They didn't have coffee machines then, but they used to sell sodas and squash and ice-cream and cigarettes. He described how his father, Louis, had opened the Louis Café in Ebbw Vale, which served soup, a joint and two veg.

It is a measure of the odd relationship the British have to food that, even in these days when chefs feature in the pages of Hell magazine, there is no entry in Who's Who, or any of the other standard works of reference for the man who altered the nation's eating habits so much, and so no clear source of biographical data. Berni had a mischievous streak, and once misleadingly told a journalist he was born in Wales, but if the rest of his story was whimsy, it was very elaborate and detailed.

What can be verified is that the Berni boom began in the crucial year of 1954 when the brothers bought a Bristol pub called the Rummer Inn, and established the famous 7s 6d set menu. They were mobbed by customers, and over the next 15 years they converted as many pubs as they could acquire.

Aldo Berni was probably the first caterer to use management consultants in his business. He was generous and helpful to others entering business careers, and earned the gratitude of a large number of younger people. He and his brother took very little out of the business, living fairly modestly and restricting themselves to one very good motorcar each.

In 1947 he had married Esme Clifton. Sprightly, teasing banter was a feature of Aldo and Esme Berni's strong marriage; however, he was devoted to her and made a part of his fortune over to her as a gift. She died first, in 1995. He was living in a nursing home in Bristol when his wife's will was published in May last year, and he was not surprised to learn that she left the bulk of her £4.8 million to a home for cats and dogs.

Richard Mason

Richard Lakin Mason, writer: born Hale, Cheshire 16 May 1919; married three times (one son, one daughter); died Rome 13 October 1997.

Richard Mason wrote two of the most popular and best-loved novels of the mid-century: The Wind Cannot Read (1947) and The World of Suzie Wong (1957). Both were romances, after a fashion; both set against exotic locales - The Wind Cannot Read in the war-torn Far East, The World of Suzie Wong in Hong Kong's bars and brothels - utterly out of reach of, and thus hugely fascinating to, the vast majority of those who quipped up to borrow them in those last expiring (essentially television-less) years of the circulating library. Both, too, were deliberately provocative in their storylines, which featured the breaking down of racial barriers, the shattering of taboos: the coming together of alien ideas, alien cultures.

A stickler for the proprieties with a horror of public fuss, the publisher Percy Hodder-Williams, of Hodder & Stoughton, had almost to be blackmailed into taking The Wind Cannot Read (the story of a British soldier who falls in love with a Japanese instructor, set against the final days of the war, and based - as its author admitted - on personal experience) so soon after the defeat of the Japanese.

Only a determined verbal assault by the firm's chief executive, the novelist Ruby Ferguson, and its director John Attenborough, turned the trick. The book later became a Book Society "recommendation", in the 1940s a powerful promotional aid.

No such worries attended the launch of The World of Suzie Wong, Mason's most spectacularly successful novel (translated into over 14 languages and selling virtually a million copies world-wide), since the moral climate had drastically altered by 1957, and any controversy about the tale of an Occidental artist falling in love with an Oriental artist's model and "yummy-yummy" girl merely added to the sales.

The book was a roaring success from the start, was turned into a Broadway, then West End, play, and then became a hugely popular film with Nancy Kwan as the eponymous tart-with-the-golden-heart and William Holden (then big box office) as the painter. Mason's future seemed bright - and yet he wrote only one other novel before retiring for ever from literature and the movies.

Richard Lakin Mason was born in Hale, Cheshire in 1919 and educated first at Downs School, Colwall, where, during his time there, W.H. Auden was a master (Auden gloomily gave the thumbs-down to Mason's first "novel", written when he was 13, "describing it as "no bloody good"), then for one term only at Giggleswick School before moving to Bryanston.

After school he joined a travel bureau in 1939, before entering the RAF as a Leading Aircraftman. From LAC he became a Pilot Officer in 1943, and Flight Lieutenant in 1944, by which time he was attached to the 14th Army in India, harrying the Japanese through Burma.

By then he had already had one novel published, the thriller The Body Fell on Berlin (1943), issued under his first two names "Richard Lakin". A second Lakin mystery Angel, Take Care came out in 1947, but by this time The Wind Cannot Read was already climbing the best-seller lists, pointing up the fact that sweeping romance invariably sells far better than crime, however ingeniously plotted, however intelligently executed. Money from the novel enabled him to travel to the West Indies, where his second mainstream novel, The Shadow and the Peak (1949), another gripping romance, was set.

During the 1950s he wrote film scripts, for Pacific Destiny (1956), based on the best-selling travel book by Sir Arthur Grimble, A Pattern of Islands, Nevil Shute's A Town Like Alice (1956, with W.P. Lipscomb), and his own The Wind Cannot Read (1958, featuring Dirk Bogarde as the young officer). He had already left Britain for Italy, and now lived in Rome for much of the year, holidaying at his own villa on Stromboli.

His last novel, a spy story, The Fever Tree (1962), was set in Nepal. It was neither a blazing success nor a catastrophic failure. Nevertheless its publication seems to have prompted some kind of turning-point in his life, since thereafter - for the next 30-odd years, until his death - Richard Mason seems to have been perfectly happy doing not much at all: simply travelling, pottering, living off his royalties and residuals, which, post-Suzie Wong, were almost certainly substantial.

Father John Ramsay

John Ramsay, soldier and priest: born London 24 November 1926; Spiritual Director, Scots College in Rome 1975-77; died Livingston, Lothian 15 October 1997.

A well loved and respected Roman Catholic parish priest, John Ramsay was the Guards officer who masterminded the organisation of the papal visit to Scotland in 1982.

He was born at 4 Princes Gate, London, a couple of hundred yards from the place where in 1982 the SAS made their spectacular raid on the Iranian Embassy. He often said that he couldn't help feeling that there was a chuckle up in heaven because Alec, his eldest brother and hero, was a founder member of the SAS along with David Sterling, and would thoroughly have approved of what they did so close to his old London home.

John was the youngest of four sons, born to Archie (Jack) Ramsay, Member of Parliament for Midlothian and his wife the Honourable Ismay Preston, daughter of the fourth 14th Viscount Gormanston. It was this connection that enabled Ramsay in his priest's house to impress his parishioners with a family tree which clearly linked him to William the Conqueror.

Ramsay went to Eton in January 1940 and recounts his first clear memory at the school. It was in the afternoon and I was working in my room when a friend of my brother George at the top of the house called Duncan Strachan came in and asked if I knew where George was. I answered that I thought he was out playing cricket. He then quietly and as kindly as he could, told me that Dad had been arrested and interned. You can imagine my feelings. He then went out to look for George and tell him the dismal news. George came to my room soon afterwards and we had a miserable evening.

Ramsay went on: Every evening, half an hour or so after supper, there were prayers which we all attended. On this night, however, George and I were told not to attend and we heard afterwards from Duncan what had happened. Prayers were said as usual and then before anyone could move, my tutor, the legendary Honourable George Lytton, said "Stay", and everyone stood rooted in the spot. His words were more or less as follows: "You will all have heard the news that George and John Ramsay's father has been arrested and interned. It is not my intention to enter into the politics of the thing. All I can say is that those boys shall not be made to suffer for their father. If any boy ever says anything insulting to either of them, I give you my word I shall thrash him within an inch of his life. Goodnight".

Later in the year Ramsay was playing cricket one evening and there was a disputed decision. Two boys said words to the effect that nobody could accept my word because I was just a traitor's son. I turned on my heel and walked quietly away without saying a word, and as I did someone whom I had never looked upon as a particular friend said, "Don't worry, I'll deal with this". He was as good as his word for later that evening I was summoned to George Lytton's study. "Is what I hear true boy?" "Yes Sir," I replied. "I was then dismissed. Later there was a knock on my door. There stood the culprit. I have come to apologise for what I said this afternoon. I should not have said it. I have had my punishment." Indeed he had. He could scarcely walk.

When Ramsay looked back after all those years he was still amazed at the fact that there was only one incident in four years in a school of 1100 boys. "I learnt a lot at Eton but the thing I have treasured all my life most to this day is tolerance".

Ramsay blamed Winston Churchill for his father's disgrace which stemmed from the fact that he had a large number of German aristocratic friends in the 1930s and that he had been as a strong supporter of Neville Chamberlain, and dismissive of Churchill in the House of Commons. The iniquitous regulation 18b under which he was interned saved those who wanted him out of the way the trouble of proving him guilty, which they knew he wasn't, while preventing him from proving his innocence. Ramsay remembered visiting his father in Brixton Prison during those four awful years from 1940 to 1944.

Ramsay (centre) with the Pope in Scotland, 1982

In 1944 Ramsay joined the Scots Guards, like two of his brothers. He was to defend his father on the grounds that he was never even tried, while three of his four sons were allowed to join a crack regiment like the Scots Guards.

Ramsay served in Malaya with distinction where his fellow Scots Guards officer David, Earl of Airlie recalled that he was a very effective leader of men in the horrors of jungle warfare. It was possibly in Malaya that the seeds were sown for his decision to forsake a promising army career and go to Beda College in Rome in 1955 to study for the priesthood.

CASE SUMMARIES: 20 OCTOBER 1997

The following notes of judgments were prepared by the reporters of the All England Law Reports.

Planning

Wardsworth LBC v MIBs & Allen Ltd; QBD (Crown Office List) (Mr G. Moriarty QC) 5 Sept 1997.
A local authority was entitled to seek orders requiring the removal of an advertisement displayed on a boarding surrounding land on which building operations were taking place in accordance with a grant of planning permission for the development of a nursing home. The advertisement did not fall within the deemed consent given by s 6 and Class 8 of the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1992 as the development was for residential and not commercial or business purposes.
Colin Morgan (Stonehenge, Croydon) for the applicant; Charles Myrnes (Birkham & Co) for the respondents.

Virgin Cinema Properties Ltd & ors v Secretary of State for the Environment

& ors; QBD (Crown Office List) (Mr G. Moriarty QC) 9 Oct 1997.
Since a planning policy did not confer rights or impose duties that were legally enforceable the court could not determine its meaning as a matter of law for the purpose of deciding an issue arising from a planning application. The decision whether or not to grant planning permission was an administrative decision which was only susceptible to review on the established principles of administrative law.
Jeremy Sullivan QC, Peter Towler (Gouldens) for the applicants; Alan Aylesbury (Treasury Solicitor) for the Secretary of State.

Evidence

G v DPP; QBD (Crown Office List) (Brooke LJ) 14 Oct 1997.
Where a child of 12 had been charged with an offence contrary to s 14(1) of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, evidence of a previous incident amounting to indecent assault, but in respect of which no prosecution had ensued, could be admitted to rebut the presumption of doli incapax, since it was relevant to show that the child knew that such conduct was wrong.

Gillian Lines (Amin & Co) for the appellants; John Blair Gould (CPS) for the Director of Public Prosecutions.

DPP v G; QBD (Crown Office List) (Brooke LJ) 13 Oct 1997.

A headteacher investigating an assault on a pupil was not a person charged with a duty to investigate offences and accordingly did not come within the provisions of s 67(9) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Evidence relating to an interview conducted by the headteacher was, therefore, admissible, even though the Code of Practice had not been complied with.
Michael Forster (CPS) for the Director of Public Prosecutions; Justin Shale (Parkinson & Co, Bracknell) for the respondent.

Tort

Bennett v Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis; Bennett v Crown Prosecution Service (sued as Director of Public Prosecutions); CHD

(Sir Richard Scott, V.C.) 8 Oct 1997.
There were no public policy reasons to justify a claim of blanket immunity from suit in an action for the tort of misfeasance in public office. The court so held when striking out the plaintiff's claim on the ground that the action was not maintainable on its present pleading.
Alan Newman QC, Brian Jubb (Hallinan Blackburn Gittings & Nott) for the plaintiff; James Lewis (D.S. Hamilton) for the first defendant; Clare Montgomery QC (Treasury Solicitor) for the second defendant.

Medicines

R v Family Health Service Appeal Authority, ex p Enfield Drugs Ltd & ors; QBD (Crown Office List) (Owen LJ) 10 Oct 1997.
Doctors, as registered medical practitioners, were not obliged under Part III of the Medicines Act 1968 to hand over medicines to patients personally. Accordingly, although there had to be personal supervision by a professionally qualified person when a pharmacist supplied medicines, doctors were entitled to delegate the supply medicines to patients to persons who were neither doctors nor pharmacists.

Duncan Ousley QC, Jonathan Fisher (Bewin Leighton) for the applicants; Michael Belfoff QC, Michael Soole (Lockharts) for the respondent.

Contract

Eagle Star Life Assurance Co Ltd v Grogan; CA (Kennedy, Morritt LJ, Sir Brian Neill) 9 Oct 1997.

Where an agreement amounted to a contract for the supply of a service within the meaning of s 12 of the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982, the terms set out in ss 13 and 14 of the Act should, prima facie, be implied. Where, however, the agreement expressly stated that the obligation to provide the service was to be judged subjectively by the party supplying it, the implied terms in ss 13 and 14 were excluded by s 16 of the Act.
Michael Burke Goffey QC, Thomas Graham (Charles Le Moine, Wellingborough) for the appellants; Donald McCue (Matthew Arnold & Baldwin, Watford) for the respondent.

It is natural to assume that the people charged with administering affairs of state know what they are doing. But the striking thing about memoirs and official records, when they are eventually published, is that they usually reveal that the government was more confused on the inside than it looked from the outside, not less. It usually turns out that ministers knew only slightly more about what was going on than the rest of us, and that most big newspaper stories are as likely to be understated as overstatements of the truth. Seen in this light, the confusion of the weekend over the Government's attitude towards the single European currency bodes ill.

Until last week it seemed clear what the Government was trying to do, although the way it was doing it seemed unnecessarily devious and over-reliant on news management. It seemed that the Prime Minister and the Chancellor wanted to talk up the possibility of Britain joining the monetary union "soon" after its launch in 15 months' time. This was logical. It helped strengthen their hand as pro-Europeans in talks with our EU partners; it brought down the pound, which helped our exporters; and it helped prepare public opinion for the eventual decision.

The trouble was that the spinning of journalists was being carried out primarily by Gordon Brown's doctors, Charlie Whelan and Ed Balls, and went beyond what Tony Blair wanted. It was when The Independent reported last Tuesday that a rift had opened between Mr Blair and Mr Brown that ministers and press officers alike began to lose control of the situation. That story was correct, evidence of which is provided by the fact that it provoked abuse rather than considered denial. Moreover, all the story did was report the fact that briefings from the Treasury were being contradicted by the Prime Minister's office - evidence that a small truth can lead to a great hullabaloo.

Mr Blair and Mr Brown, fearing that the story was becoming one of a split rather than of a policy shift, threw the engine into reverse and managed to make things worse. The Chancellor's interview on Friday, said to have been granted to The Times as a "reward" for downplaying the split story (itself a worrying sign for the relations between the press and the Government in this new era), contained one line which hinted that Britain would not join the monetary union for some time. But Mr Whelan told journalists that the Chancellor meant that Britain would not join in this parliament - in other words, until 2002. So the interview was confidently reported as "Brown rules out euro", when the Chancellor had in fact stuck to the letter of the existing line: that entry in 1999 was "very unlikely" but, if it was in the national interest and the people approved it in a referendum, it could happen then, or later. This gap between the words spoken, and the interpretation placed on them by the politicians' minders, is an increasingly disarming one. Why can't the politicians speak straight in the first place?

Some basic points remain clear. There has been no realistic prospect for some time of Britain joining monetary union when exchange rates are fixed irrevocably in 1999, although part of the Government's problem has been the Chancellor's obsessive desire to keep that option open. That, in turn, makes entry before the next election unlikely, because the next obvious date for joining would be 1 January 2002, when euro notes and coins start to circulate. If Britain were to join then, there would either have to be a referendum towards the end of Mr Blair's first term, or a general election fought on the issue in 2001. We know the Prime Minister is not keen on either option. So what is likely to happen? Oughtn't we to be discussing the options?

Mr Brown wants to keep open options for early entry because he fears business opinion might turn nasty. Mr Blair wants to put off a decision because he fears public opinion might turn to the Conservatives. There is, at the very least, a difference of emphasis on a vitally important issue. Beyond that, we do not know how the Government intends to proceed, which is an aspect of uncertainty built on a difference of view.

Mr Blair needs to rely less on nuance and more on plain speaking, preferably his own. Let him set out the options for the future, and the factors he thinks we, as a nation, ought to take into account. One implication of last weekend is that he thinks public opinion will shift when Britain is surrounded by successful euro economies (including Ireland) with lower rates of interest, and that we might have a referendum after the next election to join in around 2005. Is he then sincere in saying that this country must help shape monetary union? He must say what he thinks and defend his position in public.

Police and CS spray

Sir: It is difficult to imagine how Jack Straw, the Home Secretary, manages to sustain his optimism about the use of CS spray by the police ("Straw gives blessing to police use of CS spray", 16 October).

During a trial period, figures from the Association of Chief Police Officers showed a 6.8 per cent drop in assaults against officers armed with the spray. However, there was an even greater drop of 14 per cent in assaults against those in the unarmed control group. This may demonstrate no more than unreliable methodology, but it certainly doesn't provide evidence that CS protects the police.

The ACPO guidelines state that the spray is to be used "to gain a tactical advantage in a violent encounter" or "to subdue a violent suspect who cannot otherwise be restrained". There are numerous reports of incidents in which those affected believe that such guidance was not followed, including one occasion in which it is claimed that the police sprayed CS into a crowded coach and shut the doors, and another where CS was used during an incident in a children's home.

If Jack Straw wants the police to have "the best protection that we can provide", he would do well to give serious consideration to how best to develop effective policing strategies which respect civil liberties and uphold human rights standards - an approach far more likely to sustain and enhance the public co-operation, trust and confidence on which the police depend - rather than arming officers with a quick fix solution based on muddled research.

Working women

Sir: In asking two women with only one child between them, one in her twenties and one in her thirties, to comment on the proposition that some women in their forties are finding that "work doesn't work any more" (report, 17 October), you missed the chance to make a serious contribution to a discussion that, far from being a passing concern for a few women, is one of today's major issues, regardless of gender.

I have been a working mother, in a chief executive position, for seven years. I look back on the first two years, when I had only one child, as a period of ease and simplicity. Adding a second child to an equation that already contains a highly pressured job adds stresses and complications that are, quite simply, unimaginable to parents who think they have it all sorted.

The most pressing need in this whole debate is that we recognise that work is only one element in the lives of both men and women, and alter our expectations of individuals accordingly. Otherwise we become little more than the fodder of a modern industrial revolution, slaving away from dawn to midnight for no apparent purpose other than enabling our children to grow up and do the same to themselves.

Competition Bill

Sir: Few would disagree that the present UK law on competition is inadequate, if not useless. This does not mean that it is heretical to oppose the planned replacement ("Nothing to fear from the Competition Bill", 17 October).

The Bill is a monster. "Well-run businesses should have nothing to fear from the legislation," you say. They won't, provided they have enough lawyers crawling over their business dealings.

The Bill is intended to apply the principles of European competition law in the UK arena. The Treaty of Rome's two articles have 375 words between them. Most of the relevant procedure is contained in a single regulation, dating from 1962, which runs to about 5,500 words.

The 72 clauses of the Competition Bill contain 15,000-odd words. The 14 schedules add at least 20,000 more. Length alone would not matter if it was set out as an orderly narrative. It is not. Beating a course through the verbal thicket will challenge the reasoning of the non-specialist lawyer, let alone the businessman or consumer.

A textual comparison between the Conservative government's 1996 draft and the present government's two drafts reveals that much of the original remains intact. Improvements have been tacked on like lean-to extensions to a building unfit for human habitation.

We have waited a long time for a substantial reform of UK competition law. Surely we could wait a little longer for the draftsman to produce a more elegant design, closer to the spare European model.

Smoking risks

Sir: The claim that smokers' families are 25 per cent more likely to get cancer (report, 17 October) is not supported by sound science. The so-called "shocking new research" on which this assertion is based is merely a review of data from selected earlier research studies, the results of which have been available for up to 20 years.

The conclusions of this review are simply not justified by the data. Certain reports by respected authors giving conclusions to the contrary are ignored. The vast majority of epidemiological studies of environmental tobacco smoke and lung cancer and heart disease have not reported overall statistically significant increases in risk. Your claim that "tens of thousands" of people die prematurely each year due to exposure to environmental tobacco smoke is unsupportable by the weight of existing scientific evidence.

To suggest that the Government could cut heart disease deaths at a stroke by banning smoking in public places is misguided, especially when actual risk factors such as a high fat diet, obesity, etc. are ignored.

Intimating, as Dr Bill O'Neill from the British Medical Association does, that individual smokers are exposing their loved ones to needless risk and killing non-smokers is playing on people's emotions.

Author satisfaction

Sir: In your article "Bloomberg gloom" (6 October), concerning the Society of Authors' survey of book publishers' performance, reference was made to Robert Hale as "no-hopers", a breathtaking misrepresentation of the survey's findings.

Of 40 UK publishers considered, Robert Hale was placed joint third in the league table and equal second for overall performance which was described as "excellent". We were one of only two publishers scoring 100 per cent in author satisfaction.

Football hooliganism

Sir: Journalists repeatedly bemoan the failure to prevent "hooligans" from travelling to England football games abroad. The way to do this is to order convicted hooligans to attend at their local police station at the time of each England match.

Wildlife under threat

Sir: I must correct one point in Polly Toynbee's excellent article (13 October) on the proposed fifth terminal at Heathrow. The rare Water Avens plant does not occur on the Ferry Oaks Sludge Works, but in the old Colne Valley meadow to the west of the airport, the site of the proposed TS/M25 spur road complex.

This flower-rich meadow is not within the airport boundary, and the destruction of it goes against the principles of UK biodiversity plans. No such colony of plants exists anywhere else in the South-east, which is too dry. BAA are now proposing "translocation" - but there are no similar damp meadows in the area for this to work.

This may not be a "picnic spot" but it is part of the heritage of West Middlesex and indeed London - the Colne Valley is a Regional Park - and what is the logic of destroying our precious wildlife, so that we can fly at whim, often to visit the natural world of other countries whose existence is threatened by global warming?

Polly Toynbee made some good points about rationing in the future, the first time I have seen "demand management" brought into the debate. With airports and flying threatening sustainable development worldwide, this is a subject vital for inclusion at the Kyoto Summit.

It takes all sorts...

Sir: Emma Houghton, in her article on regional accents (15 October), makes the point that there is a hierarchy of accents in Britain, and that this is discriminatory. However, she accepts that those with "undesirable" regional voices should "adapt" or "modify" to fit in. Would your paper accept the same conclusion in relation to those of different race or colour?

In "Cool Britannia", in the Nineties, I had hoped that difference was to be celebrated rather than stigmatised.

Coming to a hedgerow near you, the fabulous new autumn season

MILES KINGSTON

And the good news is that autumn shades are here again! Yes, in hedgerows and catwalks the length and wholehearted breadth of Britain, the new range of autumn tints and hues is on display, from Indian summer yellow to Kashmir problem brown, sending the seasonal fashion writers into a tizzy of excitement.

"Yes, indeed, a sensational new range of autumn hues is here this year," drools Mahopica Japonica, our girl in the shrubbery, "softening the landscape with a layer of freshly fallen, hand-grown leaves which stretch stunningly across the world of autumn in a symphony of chocolate browns, russets, pippins and blackberry crumble. September is out now and October is IN, and to celebrate the new month, they have created the most divine new look of drifting foliage, off-the-shoulder old man's beard and a constant shimmer of falling chestnut leaves - but mind that cowpat!"

Yes, Mind that Cowpat! is just one of the many hilarious new offerings in the new BBC autumn schedule, which was unveiled recently before a gasping crowd of acolytes in the presence of BBC Chairman Sir Piggie Bland. "Seventy five autumns have come and gone, and still the BBC blunders on," said Sir Piggie Bland to cheers, before declaring autumn officially open with a season of repeats that no other broadcaster can match. You saw it last year and you'll see it again next year and it's here again this year - yes, autumn! When the old countryman sets off across the fields looking for the sloe bush to yield its annual crop of sloes for him to make his winter-long brew of gin and sugar and sloes, and keeps looking for the sloe bush, and goes on looking for the old sloe bush, but doesn't find it because it's been grubbed up by the conservation-minded farmer, so he says, "Oh, what the hell - this year I'll buy a bottle of sloe gin from Seabury's, and be buggered to the old sloe bush!"

Yes, Be Buggered To The Old Sloe Bush! is a wacky autumn BBC TV food, drink and sex show in which contestants try and think up something new in the cooking line but fail, just one of the many new programme ideas on the BBC this autumn, the channel that brought you Delia's Myth, and Rick's Time, and whatever happened to Keith Floyd? And two fat ladies, both dressed like mother, one's merry and so is the other, and the Spice Girls (that's four of them, Dried Spice, Allspice, Mixed Spice, and Mince Spice) and talking of current affairs, the spin doctors have been out in the hedgerows again, stringing us all along with gossamer cobwebs, because it's Autumn! And time for your child to take baked beans tins to harvest festival, though no British child knows where baked beans come from or where they grow, yet believe it or not, girls, baked bean brown is one of the top 10 British autumn tints of all time! The others being: 1) St Auburn's; 2) Burnt toast; 3) Fading Summer Suntan; 4) Old Army Khaki; 5) Milk Chocolate; 6) Natural Brunette; 7) Knees Up Mrs Brown; 8) Tea Bag Stain On The Table; and 9) Look What The Dog's Done, because all roads lead to ruin, and deep in the hedgerow something stirred, if it wasn't a badger it must be a bird, and it's nearly time for Guy Fawkes Night, when we try to set the garden alight, because it's

Autumn! Season of echoes and drama-does, and seized-up locks and putting back clocks, when the sailor puts his boat away, and the farmer makes straw and girls make hay, and it's only 20,000 TV ads till Christmas, but forget about Christmas because it's still autumn and it's time to do what-ever the opposite of spring cleaning is, autumn mowing about, that's it! Messing up the landscape with squashed conkers, and messy meadows, and rusch-pinked spectacles, and unmade beds of bracken, and exhausted runner beans, and fox droppings, and falling fronds of the flower which you call fouglove but I call digitalis.

"Yes, You Call It Fouglove But I Call It Digitalis! is the flagship comedy series of the new autumn schedule!" said Sir Piggie Bland, addressing a host of notepads. "I don't know what a flagship comedy is, but I do know that we are entering a new digital era, and if we don't keep up, we will fall behind, isn't that right John?"

Yes, Isn't That Right, John? is a wacky new comedy about two TV bosses who agree not to fire each other, only everyone else, and it's on your TV every night from now on, and as the days get shorter and the nights get longer, and the hot water bottles move mysteriously to the bottom of the bed in the dark, and the apples lie in silent rows in the shed, as dead as Remembrance Day, remember to wear your poppy with pride, because summer did her best but died, and it's now...

Autumn!
Coming soon: winter.

Guilty: of killing courtroom drama with the cosh of scientific evidence

THOMAS
NANNY TRIAL

Watching the trial of Louise Woodward, the English nanny accused of causing the death of her charge, the first thing that strikes you is what had television it makes. I don't mean by this that Sky News has made the wrong decision in broadcasting the trial almost in its entirety — because if you have the time on hand it offers something decidedly more gripping than the routine packing material of 24-hour news. But there's no getting round the fact that, compared to most fictional courtroom scenes, this is weary stuff — leadenly paced and lacking in any sense of dramatic protocol. The quality of real trials that almost never makes it into the fictional version, you realise, is their grinding laboriousness.

The other day, for example, Barry Scheck, the defending counsel, attempted to speed up the process of identifying slides of brain tissue taken from the dead child — a business that must already have seemed interminable to the jury. The prosecution objected, insisting that he stick to a much more long-winded procedure, in which he asked questions and his witness gave him the answers he already knew.

Nor does the judge have any respect for the demands of narrative urgency: on the same day he interrupted a developing line of questions by lecturing the jury on the elaborate mental precautions they were to take whenever a lawyer used the word "assuming". The principals "um" and "er", lose their places in their notes, fall silent for aching gaps of consideration, blunder with their charts and diagrams, get entangled in microphone wires, fuss over sight-lines, address each other with casual informality and even miss the point of a question completely. In short, everything they do dissipates any sense of narrative tension.

It is easily restored, of course, by a recollection of the circumstances of the case: one loved child dead and another — seen always as a cameo profile from the court's fixed camera — patiently attending the autopsy of her life. But — apart from tautly dramatic occasions such as the testimony of the bereaved parents — it requires an act of imagination to restore moral urgency to the drab procedure you see here. When it comes to the complex scientific evidence, this anaesthetising dullness is exactly what the defence lawyers want — to draw the jury into deeper and deeper levels of magnification until their sense of perspective becomes confused. It was what Barry Scheck was doing the other day by pursuing his evidence down to the cellular level, where the formation of capillaries and the deposit of microscopic grains of calcium might finally offer a fingerhold for "reasonable doubt".

And in this respect at least the growing use of scientific evidence and expert witnesses has had an odd effect on the trial as a drama of justice, a performance in which our desires for fair accountability are acted out. Science has (paradoxically) given its genuine promise of enlarged understanding expanded the territory for thoughtful uncertainty farther and farther outwards, until barely a strip of ground remains for absolute conviction. If all that you see are fictional trials, this might sound counter-intuitive: on screen, or in novels, the courtroom remains a place where the old forms of judgement — gut instinct and amateur psychology — go hand in hand with scientific absolutism. The DNA test being the very pinnacle of irrefutability. In real trials, though, it is increasingly clear that scientific minutiae provide a place of refuge for a lawyer in difficulties. A kind of arms race of expertise has therefore developed, with both sides fielding prodigiously qualified witnesses to deploy their professional convictions on either side of the question — the net result often being an almost perfect equilibrium of incomprehensible authority. Evidence is called about the nature of evidence and even, sometimes, evidence about the evidence for the evidence — a vertiginous recession of closer and closer inspection. How does a jury find its feet in such a dizzying place?

One answer may be suggested in a phrase used by the neuropathologist who testified the other day. He talked at one point about "gross observation", meaning the first, general assessment of the facts, without the aid of microscopes or scientific instruments. He was using the word dispassionately, but "gross" is a term that carried overtones of contempt long before it became a contemporary exclamation of disgust. The word implies something clumsy or coarse-grained, as opposed to the "fine" distinctions of detailed observations (and, in that, it testifies to our general cultural prejudice in favour of refinement, the broad assumption that truth will always increase in direct ratio to the degree of magnification). But "gross observation" is probably what most juries (by which I mean most people, including myself) are naturally inclined towards. It is certainly the quality that is most frequently represented in fictional courtroom scenes, where the sly intuition of the barrister will provoke a revealing outburst, or where a single dramatic witness will categorically turn the course of the trial.

This persistent appetite for emotional plausibility can also be exploited by lawyers. When Matthew Eappen's parents took the stand, for example, their distress was clearly being presented as if it might have evidentiary force — because their grief was beyond question, the unstated argument ran, perhaps their belief in Louise Woodward's guilt should be, too. It was a rare "dramatic" moment in the coverage — in the sense that it was the sort of scene which you could imagine fitting perfectly within the fictional conventions, in a way that the arid trudge through scientific detail never could. The discrepancy was a reminder that fictional trials continue to show us the consoling certainties we desire from justice, while real trials reveal what we in fact get — a place where verdicts are never more than a balance of probabilities, and where only a well-crafted story is likely to rescue the jury from a whirl of conflicting facts.

The soul food that America craves

MARY
A SURPRISE
BLOCKBUSTER

Every once in a while, a film not only strikes a chord with viewers, but also says something about the times. Such a film was Secrets and Lies, which charted through intersecting family lives the transformation in British social attitudes since the Fifties. Such a film, in a smaller way in a far bigger country, is Soul Food, the quiet success of the US autumn film season. By depicting a black family frankly, without the anxiety of political correctness, it has opened eyes to real black lives. It has even prompted calls for a return to traditional Sunday lunches.

Everything about the film, including the initial reviews, suggested consignment to the status of niche-movie. The plot was described as small-scale and sentimental, and the characters as stereotypical. And it was a "black" film, produced, financed and acted by blacks.

Black Americans may make up a large proportion of US cinema audiences, but their enthusiasm does not of itself guarantee a film success. Nonetheless, Soul Food, released four weeks ago, is already on the verge of overtaking The Peacemaker, the $70m budget nuclear terrorism blockbuster, as the season's most popular film.

Soul Food cost $7m to make. It has little sex or violence and no special effects — unless you count a kitchen fire that does not even burn the house down. Indeed, its lack of violence particularly was cited as a major inadequacy by the 10 Hollywood production companies that sent away George Tillman, its 28-year-old director, empty handed.

In the end it was a black impresario, Kenneth Edmonds, and his wife, Tracey, who agreed to finance it, with the proviso that songs by some of their company's artists be incorporated. But it is not the music that Soul Food enthusiasts mention first. It is the theme and the treatment: a family saga, played out around the Sunday dinner table of the matriarch, "Big Mama Joe".

To white cinema-goers, the treatment seems almost dangerous in the politically correct world of today's United States. "Big Mama" is over-plump and wears a big apron. The daughters (yes, daughters, not their husbands) stand around the table preparing roast chicken, collard greens, catfish and other black, Southern dishes. The 10-year-old boy narrator has enormous eyes that he rolls heavenward just like — dare one say — those long-vanished pictures of Little Black Sambo. His aunts have no compunction about telling him to "get his black ass out of here".

The film chronicles the near-collapse and eventual restoration of the family when "Big Mama" falls ill. Tensions burst into the open, tensions that have built up over a generation and more since the family moved from the South to Chicago.

To be sure, the characters are types, but they are types that American film-goers have rarely seen on screen before. For blacks, they offer a reflection of their real lives, positive and negative (the closeness of the family, and the strains that threaten it). For whites, they open a window on to a world that, largely by the choice of both sides, is usually closed: a black world beyond street gangs, welfare mothers and Oprah Winfrey.

And if proof were still needed that Soul Food has managed to cross the racial divide, that proof is in the eating. The sight of the laden dinner table and the sound of family banter have spurred nostalgia for traditional family meals. "A hunger for kinship," said one headline, over a set of pictures showing mainly white, multi-generational families at table, "brings the ritual back".

This is madness, unless we all agree to pay up

THE COST OF
NHS DRUGS

Recently a new drug for Alzheimer's disease finally gained its licence. Aricept, claim its manufacturers, is the first drug to make a measurable difference to those in the early stages of the disease. Some 200,000 people who are at the mild to moderate stage may be suitable for treatment with the drug.

Good news? Not for the NHS. It would cost some £200m to prescribe to all those who might want it. This one drug would eat up two-thirds of the extra bung the Chancellor has given the entire NHS to see it through the winter. A few health authorities have agreed to prescribe it and some have refused to do so, while others are still undecided, under intense pressure from patients.

They are patients such as John Gillman, a sufferer in his seventies whose wife, Marjorie, is fighting to have him prescribed Aricept on the NHS. They live in Buxton, North Derbyshire is one of the non-prescribing health authorities. She heard about the drug from a niece in Canada who saw a television programme about it. But when she took her husband to his consultant to ask for Aricept, she was told that although John should have it, the hospital could not prescribe it. Nor could their GP.

The Gillmans live on a small pension, but she is now spending £105 a month to get Aricept prescribed privately. "It means I have to save on food and heating and he's always cold," she says. "We've both worked since we were 14 and paid our taxes, and my husband fought in north Africa, Sicily and D-Day, yet we've never scrounged — unlike some. He has a right to Aricept on the NHS." North Derbyshire says no, because they have no extra money, but if the Gillmans lived elsewhere they might get it free.

Under the last government all painful rationing was shuffled off by frightened health secretaries, forcing local health authorities to decide what treatments to offer, at what opportunity cost to the rest of their patients. So people were treated randomly according to their post code, while ministers kept their hands clean of any politically dangerous decisions.

No longer. This government is poised to take the responsibility itself for NHS rationing.

Following ministers' new policy of fairness across the service, they will start to decide centrally what the NHS will and will not provide. They will begin with drug rationing, as the soaring drug bill now costs 13 per cent of NHS spending. Aricept is a good case study in rationing. It got a licence, which proved that it was both safe and efficacious. But to get a licence a drug has to offer only a marginal improvement in a condition — and the licensing authority takes no account whatever of its cost or value for money.

Now the government may

The very slight improvement it offers is bad value for the money. The drug slows the progress of the disease by about six months, but does not arrest it. It adds just a few points on the scale of cognitive abilities, measured by a technical IQ test, but the hullein concludes: "The drug failed to influence day-to-day functioning, quality of life measures and ratings scores of overall dementia." It does not make sufferers any more capable of caring for themselves.

"Rubbish," says Marjorie Gillman, who thinks Aricept is doing wonders for her husband. "He's sleeping better and he's more active, though his memory is still not good. I see a big difference in him, and so do my friends. That's why I'm paying so much for it." Perhaps it does more good to some than to others, but, in the end, double-blind trials with placebos are the only way to tell, and so far the evidence suggests that the improvement is small.

Mrs Gillman will have none of it. "I'm writing to Tony Blair to demand we get it on the NHS," she says. And most of us in her position might feel the same, clinging to anything that might ease such a terrible illness. Yet someone does have to decide whether that £200m would bring more health and happiness to more people if it were spent elsewhere.

There are now so many expensive new drugs arriving every year that the NHS is in danger of being bowled over by the cost. A central NHS Drugs Committee would at least ensure equal treatment and value for money. It would also call in existing drugs and make sure that each was the cheapest and most effective available, eventually creating a whole NHS formulary of approved drugs, striking out expensive brand names where cheaper generics were available. It would limit doctors' prescribing powers and it might end the drug companies' sleazy and unseemly advertising, inducements and brazen seductions of doctors. Now sit back and wait for the explosion of protest from the drug industry.

The scheme does have one danger. Some, like the Gillmans, will still scrimp and save to buy privately those licensed drugs that the new committee has not approved. It could widen the gap between private and NHS care — a gap that threatens the universal nature of the NHS if too many people run for private cover. After all, the collective thinking of rationing does not ask what is the best possible treatment for any one patient — only what is the best we can buy collectively with the money for everyone. Patients may prefer a private doctor, whose only concern is for each individual.

While Aricept is, at the moment, a reasonably easy case, there will be other hyper-expensive drugs with slightly better results where a new NHS Drugs Committee will have harder choices to make. A life-saver would be self-evidently a good thing, but what of drugs that are, say, twice or three times as effective as Aricept? A committee making these tough decisions in public will make rationing transparent as never before — and contentious as never before.

Once we have such a committee for drugs, there is no reason why we should not have one for surgical procedures and everything else, laying down best practice and refusing to sanction anything that doesn't deliver enough health gain per NHS pound spent. The money/happiness ratio will be there for all to see.

Will it make people more willing to be taxed to pay more for the NHS? Or will it just make more people flee to spend their money on private health insurance?

It's a risk; but clarity, fairness and transparency must be the right way to progress, treating citizens as grown-ups, with grown-up choices to make.

Markets braced for turmoil after EMU confusion

Financial markets are braced for a day of turbulence after the Government said it was "highly unlikely" that Britain would join Economic and Monetary Union in 1999. With today marking the 10th anniversary of the 1987 stock market crash and the start of order-driven trading, it promises to be a nerve-jangling session in the City, as Nigel Cope and Diane Coyle report.

The consensus among City economists yesterday was that the apparent U-turn by the Government will lead to some reversal of the stock market's surge several weeks ago when a newspaper report suggested Britain would enter EMU in the first wave. They said longer-term interest rates were likely to be lower and the need for fiscal tightening ahead of 1999 would not now be so great.

Experts predicted the pound could jump as much as the five pence to the German mark it shed earlier this month when the first policy leak persuaded the markets that Britain might join the single currency early.

On the equity markets, Adam Cole, UK economics analyst at HSBC James Capel, said: "I think markets will fall tomorrow, not catastrophically so, but we could perhaps see 50 to 100 points off the FTSE 100."

Michael Hughes, group economic adviser at BZW, the investment bank, said: "Interest rates aren't going to go down as quickly as had been thought and the exchange rate should receive a fair boost. The effect should be modestly negative for equities. The Government hasn't given up on EMU membership so convergence trends will follow, but more slowly."

He added that taxes would now not have to be raised as sharply in the 1998 and 1999 Budgets. With markets already nervous about the 1987 crash anniversary and the first day of order-driven trading emotions would be running high today, he said. "It is not exactly great timing."

David Kern, chief economist at NatWest Group, said: "Most of the initial effect will be to reverse some of the effects generated by the earlier story a few weeks ago. At that time the result was to boost the stock market and sterling came down, which was generally welcomed by British business. The initial effect could be to reverse some of those things, but I wouldn't want to exaggerate it."

Mr Kern added that Gordon Brown, the Chancellor, had not said anything inconsistent with Britain joining EMU by 2002, the date most widely expected in the City. But he said the financial markets and British business needed clarity on the issue.

Several economists said the Government's credibility in the City would be severely dented by the confusion created by contradictory, off-the-record briefings.

Gerard Lyons, chief economist at Japanese bank DKB, said he thought the decision not to join the single currency early made economic sense. But he added: "The way this has been reached reflects very badly on the Treasury team. Gordon Brown has gone from iron chancellor to Flash Gordon."

He continued: "We must hope they learn to conduct policy in a more open and sensible way. It is ridiculous to think we must learn to see what The Sun says to get the true version."

Michael Saunders, of the US investment bank Salomon Brothers, said: "People will be less inclined to believe the stories the Government is giving. There has been some harm done to credibility as far as the markets are concerned."

Returning to the financial fall-out, Mr Lyons of DKB said: "The pound will be the most interesting to watch because usually it suffers if there is a conflict at the heart of government. But because of the EMU implications that might not happen this time."

Mr Brown will be able to witness any stock market gyrations at close hand because he is due to switch on the new Stock Exchange Electronic Trading System, dubbed "Big Bang Two".

There has already been mounting speculation over whether the FTSE 100 is set for a correction. Footsie started this year at 4,118 but jumped 161 points to 5,226 late last month following reports that the Government favoured early EMU entry. It stood at 5,271 on Friday.

A new poll for Salomon Brothers by Mori showed that 54 per cent were against Britain joining the single currency, 27 per cent in favour and 19 per cent undecided.

Marks & Spencer signs up to the euro

Britain could be sucked inexorably into the European currency system, according to some Treasury officials.

Barrie Clement discloses a highly significant decision by Marks & Spencer to accept the euro which could make the death of the pound a virtual fait accompli.

Marks & Spencer, the UK's leading retailer, will reveal this week its intention to accept the euro in its 286 stores throughout Britain when it comes into use on the Continent on January 1999.

Despite a likely decision by the British Government to stay out of the system for the time being, other retail groups are expected to follow suit, making the euro a "shadow" currency in this country.

The purely commercial actions of some of Britain's flagship companies could set up a gravitational pull into the new currency, some Treasury officials believe.

Widespread use of the euro would familiarise Britons with its use and perhaps dilute some of their more xenophobic fears.

A spokeswoman for Marks & Spencer yesterday confirmed the decision, arguing that continental visitors to Britain after 1999 would want to use the euro for shopping and that the stores chain was preparing to accept it.

New euro-friendly tills are ready to go "live" at two locations - in Cardiff and Reading - and five more will be up and running by the end of November.

The Marks & Spencer spokeswoman said the new tills were being introduced partly because existing machinery was nearing the end of its 10-year life span. After more than a decade of use it was important to access all the implications when deciding on replacements.

She pointed out that the tills would also be able to accept any major currency - the company has more than half its retail outlets abroad. But she acknowledged that the euro was uppermost in the company's mind.

Customers will be able to go into any Marks & Spencer store in Britain, pay for the goods in euros and have their change in sterling. It is thought that Marks & Spencer made the decision to keep pace with competitors who might also be adopting a similar policy.

One senior source in the store's group said that other big retailers would be "daft" not to follow suit.

At the moment the only large businesses accepting foreign currencies are hotels and some businesses in areas such as Holyhead in North Wales where some traders accept Irish punts.

Some officials at the Treasury are keen to point to the decision by Marks & Spencer because they believe it reinforces the view that there is an inexorable movement towards British acceptance of the new currency.

That view remains despite warnings by Gordon Brown, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that taxes would need to be increased by £20bn if Britain decided to join the single currency in the first wave in January 1999.

BT set to hold talks with rival bidders for MCI

British Telecom is this week expected to hold talks with the two US phone companies battling to buy MCI, its American partner. Meanwhile WorldCom, one of the bidders, is strongly tipped to raise its $30bn (£19bn) offer for MCI as early as today. Chris Godsmark, Business Correspondent, reports.

Though BT's year-long hopes of taking over MCI appear finished, the company looks set to salvage its US ambitions with a three-way link-up. BT and MCI paved the way to discussions last week when both companies lifted a gagging clause in their merger agreement, which prevented them from talking to outside bidders.

However, penalty clauses remain in force, which would compel MCI to pay BT $450m plus £15m in expenses if the US group was taken over without BT's agreement. The penalty clause, plus BT's existing 20 per cent stake in MCI, give the UK group a pivotal role in any discussions.

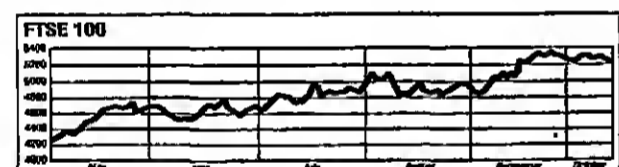

BT would be obliged to hold talks with both rival bidders for MCI, according to advisers. However, sources close to BT have made clear their preference for a deal with GTE, the local phone group which last week entered the ring with a $28bn all-cash offer. BT's revised $24bn bid for MCI, in a mixture of cash and shares, was in effect shot down earlier this month when WorldCom pounced with its $30bn all-share offer.

The high-profile publicity assault by Bernard Ebbers, WorldCom's president, is thought to have alienated BT's senior management. Advisers have pointed to the closer links between GTE's management culture and the warm signals of support for BT's continuing role in an alliance voiced last week by Chuck Lee, GTE's chairman.

The situation could be further complicated if WorldCom, as is widely expected on Wall Street, this week raises its bid for MCI by around 10 per cent, to $33bn. GTE would almost certainly have to follow suit.

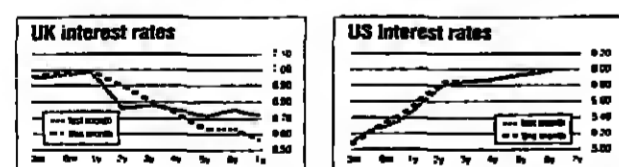

BT yesterday refused to comment on reports it had already held discussions with GTE before WorldCom launched its offer on 1 October, or that the UK group was keen for a three-way merger with MCI and GTE. MCI is known to have been approached by GTE twice over the past 18 months. Mr Lee contacted MCI last year, before BT's original bid, and again this summer.

Longer hours would improve economic performance

One thing people know about Britain's economic performance is that the level of UK productivity, or output per worker, is lower than that of many of our competitors. Improving competitiveness is seen as a matter of boosting productivity.

But the latest research by some of the foremost experts on the productivity question has overturned this received idea. Research to be published this week shows that by 1989 Britain had a productivity level only slightly behind that in the US and Canada and ahead of Germany and France.

The main reason for differences in economic performance is found to be investment in physical capital or education rather than improving productivity. The main reason the UK has lower national output per head than the US is due to a history of lower investment and the fact that Americans tend to work more hours than Britons.

The research, in the quarterly bulletin of the National Institute of Economic and Social Research, also shows that the impression of miraculous growth in South-east Asia is misleading. Although countries such as Hong Kong, Singapore and Japan had higher GDP per head than Britain in 1992, they all had lower GDP per hour worked.

Improving Britain's economic performance, in short, means working longer and spending less.

It might improve GDP per head, but would send us lower down the quality of life league. - Diane Coyle

IN BRIEF

Windfall factor 'disappearing from the high street'

Higher interest rates are unnecessary, according to a new retail report which says that the windfall factor is disappearing from the high street and that consumers are behaving cautiously. The report from Verdict Research on "Retailing in 2001" says that though windfall spending has made its mark on sectors such as DIY, electrical goods and furniture, "this demand surge is now easing off".

The report says that many consumers have used their windfalls to bring forward planned spending on household goods. It says the slowdown will be steeper than underlying trends warrant. It predicts a slowdown in 1999. Verdict forecasts retail sales growth in real terms will be 5 per cent this year, slowing to 3 per cent in 1999.

Pay awards kept down

Wage settlements in manufacturing are falling despite the upward pressure being put on pay levels by the decline in unemployment. The latest figures from the Confederation of British Industry's pay databank show that awards averaged 3 per cent in the third quarter of the year. This compares with 3.3 per cent in the previous quarter and 3.1 per cent in the same period last year. Four in 10 manufacturers said pay rises were being kept down by their inability to raise prices while 20 per cent said the low rise in the cost of living was an important factor.

Accountants set to merge

International accountants Ernst & Young and KPMG are expected to announce a merger this week in a move which will form the world's largest accountancy firm. An announcement could be made as early as today.

The firms will face an uphill battle to win regulatory approval for the move, which would reduce to four the number of "big six" accountants and give the combined firm a fee income of $15.9bn (£9.8bn). The move follows the recent merger announcement by Coopers & Lybrand and Price Waterhouse.

BTR nears £500m disposal

Engineering conglomerate BTR is thought to be close to a £500m disposal of its polymeric products arm to Legal & General Ventures, a consortium backed by Fuji Bank of Japan. The sale would be BTR's first disposal since it announced a restructuring last month.

Waterstone's may launch buyout

The management of Waterstone's may launch a buyout of the bookselling chain if a trade buyer attempts to buy the group ahead of its demerger from troubled retailer WH Smith. With pressure increasing on Smith's chairman, Jeremy Hardie, ahead of the company's annual meeting on Wednesday, Nigel Cope, City Correspondent reports on the latest developments.

The Waterstone's management team has already received expressions of interest from possible backers interested in funding a management buyout of the highly regarded chain. Waterstone's is expected to be valued at around £300m following its demerger from Smith's next year.

Waterstone's management, led by managing director Alan Giles, is thought to favour the demerger route but it is understood they may move to buy the chain if it becomes clear that a trade buyer is about to make a swoop before it is spun off. Speculation has centred on possible US buyers such as Barnes & Noble, which is keen to expand in Britain.

However, it is possible that UK groups, such as Kingfisher, may also be interested. It is thought WH Smith may have already received some interest from potential buyers.

Some institutional investors have been expecting management to make an offer for Waterstone's, which is a successful business and seen as an immediate takeover target following demerger. A buyout would offer the management team the chance to make their fortune rather than simply remain as a hired hand. However, if Mr Giles did decide to pursue an MBO he would have to resign from the Smith's board while he put his bid together.

WH Smith said yesterday that it had no knowledge of a possible MBO and Mr Giles was not available to comment.

The demerger will be discussed at the company's annual meeting on Wednesday. It comes as pressure increases on Mr Hardie, the WH Smith chairman, whose handling of the Tim Waterstone approach and the search for the chief executive has been roundly criticised.

Mr Hardie is said to be "bruised" by the attacks on him. Some say Mr Hardie has lost as much credibility inside the group as outside it and may soon step down. The company dismissed suggestions some of its non-executives are keen to step down as their roles are becoming too time-consuming. Meanwhile, it is understood that Richard Handover, the new Smith's chief executive, and finance director Keith Hamill are in take a more active part in the management of the high street chain. Some insiders say that Beverley Hodson will retain the title of managing director but will focus more on buying and marketing.

Five employment killers in or out of EMU

"Flexible labour markets" have become buzzwords in Anglo-Saxon economies in recent years and the new Labour Government is now actively seeking to export the concept to the European continent. This is natural, since the very sharp reduction in unemployment in the US and UK during the 1990s, and the equally sharp increase in unemployment in continental Europe, has created a strong presumption that the Anglo-Saxons must be doing something very right, while the continentals are doing something very wrong. This perception partly explains the Prime Minister's lack of immediate enthusiasm for taking the UK into EMU.

Clearly, there is a great deal of truth in the flexibility caricature but, like most caricatures in economics, it does not contain the whole truth. The most obvious problem is that the recent divergence in employment performance between the Anglo-Saxon and continental economies is due at least in part to differences in demand and the economic cycle, and not to the underlying structure of the labour market.

We will not know for some time how much credit for the employment gap should be given to the exemplary monetary policy decisions taken in the last few years by the Federal Reserve and the Bank of England, as compared with the less-than-exemplary decisions taken by the Bundesbank. A definitive judgement on this will need to wait until the present economic cycle is over in both cases. However, the evidence at the moment surely supports the view that old-fashioned demand management, as operated by the respective central banks, carries a lot of the responsibility.

At the height of the Keynesian era, it was common for people to forget entirely about the structure of the labour market, and to place all of the blame for rising unemployment on demand management errors. It is important not to jump to the opposite extreme in the present enthusiasm for structural solutions for every economic problem. In bald terms, the central banks of continental Europe could have created much more employment, with only negligible inflation risks, by operating with an easier monetary stance, especially in 1994-96.

The caricature about continental Europe also overlooks the wide differences which exist between the individual countries on the Continent. If we strip out cyclical factors by taking the average unemployment in the period from 1983-96, we find that one-third of the population of Europe lived in countries with a lower unemployment rate than the United States. Several of these long-standing low-unemployment economies, including Austria, Germany, Norway, Portugal, Sweden and Switzerland, are not usually thought to have flexible labour markets. Meanwhile the UK, with the most flexible labour market in Europe, had one of the higher unemployment rates.

This point is made in an excellent recent paper by Professor Stephen Nickell of Oxford University (in the Journal of Economic Perspectives, Summer 1997). He also points out that a "flexible labour market" is not a monolithic concept, but has very many different aspects which apply in varying degrees in individual economies.

A single definition of a flexible labour market, if one had to be coined, would be a market in which wages adjust to eliminate any gap between the supply and demand for labour, so that high levels of unemployment do not persist. But this is clearly not sufficient. Most users of the term would also wrap into its meaning a series of other ideas: for example, that the search process in the labour market works efficiently, so that frictional unemployment is minimised; that non-wage labour costs, such as payroll taxes, are not onerous; that skills adjust in line with changes in technology; and that the structure of unemployment benefits should encourage the jobless actively to seek work.

Features of the labour market which are commonly said to reduce flexibility include high levels of unionisation, legislation to protect workers' rights, restrictions on the employer's right to fire staff, requirements to include worker directors on company boards, and minimum wage legislation.

It is immediately apparent that several of the factors which contribute to an inflexible labour market, while in theory damaging to unemployment, may well be desirable from the point of view of other objectives, such as social justice and an equitable income distribution. Indeed, this is how these features of the labour market gained political support in the first place. Their abolition would not be cost-free, certainly not for the politicians involved. Consequently, it is crucial to investigate which of the particular features of an inflexible labour market involve the risk of high unemployment, and which do not.

This is where Professor Nickell's paper provides an invaluable service, since he answers precisely this question by performing cross-country correlations which separate the malign features of an inflexible labour market from the benign features.

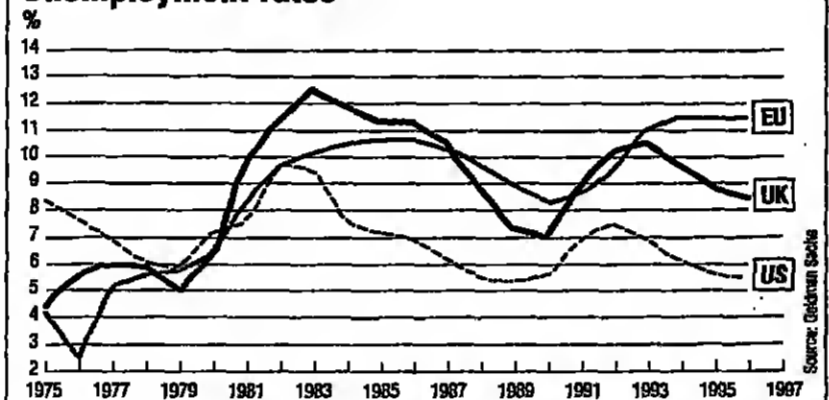

The elements which Professor Nickell finds to be associated with high unemployment on a cross-country basis include generous unemployment benefits which are not time-limited, wage-bargaining mechanisms where there is no co-ordination between unions or employers, high overall levels of taxation (rather than labour taxes per se), high minimum wages for young people who associated with payroll taxes, and poor educational standards at the bottom end of the labour market.

These are the five "employment killers" which Gordon Brown should be focused upon in his European employment initiative. Obviously, they will not be easy to eliminate, but at least they represent a set of identifiable and limited targets, and they happen to co-incide very handily with New Labour's domestic economic objectives in the UK.

Even more important, there are several features of inflexible labour markets which are not associated with high unemployment, and which can therefore be embraced for social reasons without doing any real damage. Several of these are quite surprising, such as minimum wages for adults, high standards of employment protection like those which may emerge from the Social Chapter, generous levels of unemployment support which taper down after a few months, and high levels of unionisation, provided that there is a formal system for co-ordinating wage claims among unions and employers. People can legitimately disagree about whether these features are intrinsically desirable for social reasons, but at least they should not be discarded because they cause unemployment.

So what the British government needs to do is to implement at home the benign features of "flexibility", push the Continent to do the same, and forget about the parts that are not associated with unemployment. This will help prepare the UK for eventual EMU membership, though this certainly does not seem imminent following the weekend's press guidance. The Government, having predictably decided against first-round entry, has decided to retain control over the political agenda by unofficially "ruling out" EMU until the next election. By doing this, it hopes to prevent a flood of stories continuously asking whether the time is yet ripe. And the Government can be expected to be dragged "reluctantly" by British business towards membership—a political advantage compared to the alternative of appearing eager for membership, only to be met with vilification from a hostile press. Of course, if it should change its mind and decide to join in a couple of years' time, it can simply summon the press and announce that the situation has changed.

Endowment mortgage crisis widens

Coopers & Lybrand has issued a stark warning that unless more insurers own up now to shortfalls on endowment mortgages they will face a mis-selling disaster when the policies mature. As Andrew Verity reports, up to a million people are likely to be affected.

The leading accountant said its own analysis of mortgage-related endowments showed companies were charging between 50 and 100 per cent more than policyholders were led to believe when they bought the plans.

While the charges ate into the policies at a much faster rate than assumed, the policies were also likely to grow at a much slower rate than they had until now, the firm said. This is likely to leave hundreds of thousands of policyholders without enough to pay off their mortgages when their endowments mature.

Nigel Masters, head of life actuarial practice at Coopers & Lybrand, said: "All the evidence so far suggests there is a case that needs to be investigated. Insurance companies must act now if they are going to head off another mis-selling disaster.

"They will need to assess the extent of the problem and put a plan in place to sort it out as soon as possible. Anyone who has an endowment mortgage and is worried about their situation should contact their mortgage company without delay."

The warning follows a revelation that Eagle Star was using its own money, perhaps running into millions of pounds, to top up contributions to endowment policies which looked set to fall short of the mortgage they were designed to pay off.

Coopers, which lists many life insurance companies among its clients, said it was trying to jolt life insurance companies into pre-emptive action on endowments. Otherwise, the sector would face damaging action from government or regulators when policies matured.

As well as Eagle Star, Royal Sun Alliance and Pearl Assurance have said they were taking action to ensure policyholders knew about the danger of a shortfall. Pearl has written to

Company	Annual growth needed (%)	Deficit if annual growth is 7.5 per cent
Royal Insurance	7.5	0
Allied Dunbar	9.25	£8,800
Commercial Union	8.9	£8,988
Equitable Life	8.5	£9,700
Guardian	8.75	£9,400

The table shows the level of investment growth needed for an endowment to pay off a mortgage of £50,000 with a term of 25 years. If the insurer's investments grow by less than the figure in column two, the policyholder is likely to face a deficit. Column three shows how big the deficit will be if growth is 7.5 per cent a year, taking the company's charges into account.

Source: insurers' own figures provided in response to an FT questionnaire more than 35,000 policyholders, 10 per cent of the 300,000 policies on its books.

Royal Sun Alliance has written to 15 per cent of the 400,000 policyholders who took out low-cost endowments with Royal Life, Scottish Widows and Scottish Provident have also informed some policyholders.

If this pattern is repeated across the industry, more than a million policyholders are likely to be facing a shortfall.

But Coopers & Lybrand fears many other life insurers are too fearful of bad publicity to admit in public that they need to take action. This is despite the fact that many appear to be in a worse position than those who have taken action.

Many policies have such high charges that unless investments keep growing at a high rate, the policyholders could face a nasty shock at maturity.

While Royal is taking action, most of its policyholders have benefited from good long-term investment growth which has softened the problem with charges. But this effect will be smaller with insurers whose investments have done less well.

Coopers & Lybrand said concern should centre around those offices whose investments had performed less well than the insurers who had admitted some policyholders would suffer shortfalls (see table).

Industry data shows people who took out policies with Guardian Assurance needed to see investment growth of 8.75 per cent a year if their endowment was to meet their mortgage. If growth was only slightly lower, at 7.5 per cent a year, a policyholder with a mortgage of £50,000 over 25 years would see a deficit of £9,400.

Yet according to statistics specialists Micropal, Guardian's main investment for endowments, its managed life fund, has grown by just 5.9 per cent a year over 10 years. Many Guardian policies were sold by its tied agent, Nationwide, which has expressed concern its investments are growing too slowly.

Industry experts also believe endowments maturing in future will see much lower growth. According to the Institute of Actuaries, growth on with-profits policies is set to sink to half its current level by 2009.

The problem will also be aggravated by the gradual winding-down of tax relief on mortgage interest. This will be reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent next year.

Granada moves to counter Brussels' concerns over BDB

British Digital Broadcasting is likely to take action over one of the concerns raised by the European competition authorities.

Cathy Newman reports on efforts by BDB's two partners, Granada Group and Carlton Communications, to get clearance from the European Commission.

Gerry Robinson: May resign from BDB's board

One of the issues that has concerned the European Commission is the crossover of directorships. Gerry Robinson, chairman of Granada, is a director of BDB, the digital television joint venture. He is also chairman of BSkyB, which has secured a long-term programme supply deal with BDB.

One option is that Mr Robinson would give up his seat on the board of BDB to satisfy Brussels' worries.

The Commission is also thought to be looking closely at the terms of BSkyB's seven-year programme supply deal. There has been growing speculation that BSkyB may have to settle for an initial four-year agreement. Rupert Murdoch's satellite broadcaster originally owned one-third of BDB, but was forced to drop its stake after the Commission and the Independent Television Commission (ITC) objected. Granada and Carlton then bought BSkyB's share and split it between them.

BDB will kick off in a year's time, broadcasting at least 15 channels. In order to receive the programming, viewers will need to buy a set-top box, which is likely to retail at around £200.

It also emerged over the weekend that the ITC has written to BSkyB about proposals to cross-promote its pay-per-view service. Several cable companies complained that the satellite broadcaster had threatened to cross-promote its pay-per-view offering, which will rival cable operators' services, on BSkyB channels taken by cable subscribers. Cable customers would be tempted to request the BSkyB service, which could undermine the commercial success of the cable companies' own pay-per-view business.

An ITC spokesman said that asking BSkyB for comment followed the usual procedure. "Whenever we get a complaint, we always get the whole story."

Ashley Faulk, director of programming at Telewest Communications, the UK's second-largest cable company, said one answer was to substitute other material during BSkyB's cross-promotions of rival services. "Cable companies could opt out of BSkyB's promotion and insert their own material, such as local advertising," he said. "Or they could opt-in with a different promotion for a BSkyB channel which they do carry."

Pay-per-view allows customers to pay to watch individual movies and sporting events. BSkyB, which has in the past focused on pay-per-view sport, confirmed on Friday night that it had signed a deal with Warner Brothers, the Hollywood studio. A consortium of cable companies has also secured agreement with Warner, and pay-per-view tie-ups with Sony and Paramount are imminent.

Fidelity leads shift into UK life assurance

Fidelity, the world's largest fund management group, has announced plans to set up a life insurance company in the UK.

As Andrew Verity reports, more fund managers are set to follow in a bid to grab a slice of the lucrative market in defined contribution pension schemes.

Fidelity has confirmed it is applying to the Department of Trade and Industry for permission to set up a life insurance company. Up to five other fund managers are expected to follow it into the market within 12 months.

Fidelity's decision adds force to a trend among large fund managers who see opportunities in the UK market. Many expect a sharp growth in the number of defined contribution pension schemes, where benefits depend on contributions and investment growth.

Fidelity's move follows confirmation three months ago that JP Morgan, the American investment bank, was setting up a life insurance company. M&G, Mercury Asset Management, Fleming and PDM have already set up their own life insurance arms.

Watson Wyatt, the worldwide benefit consultancy, said a further five fund managers, some from Europe, were expected to enter the UK market. The firm is already advising a number of asset managers which it declined to name.

Mike Wadsworth, a partner at Watson Wyatt, who advises on new life company launches, said: "Many large organisations are setting up pensions, such as Price Waterhouse, and asset managers want to be able to provide all the vehicles. The life company structure is the most competitive and flexible vehicle for doing that business."

Foreign fund managers already handle a large chunk of the UK's £700bn of pension savings. But they are disadvantaged in competing with traditional life insurers because they operate their funds as unit trusts, which incur stamp duty.

The new life insurance companies will allow them to compete directly in the market for stakeholder pensions, a new vehicle for defined contribution pensions expected to be launched by the Government by the turn of the century.

Until now, asset managers that do not have life insurance arms have been handicapped in competing for new business because they say it is more complicated for them to offer a "one-stop" service to employers.

NEW
XJ SERIES.
BETTER
UP.

At first glance, you may think that the latest offering from Jaguar is hardly a revelation. Nothing could be further from the truth. A new family of V8 engines lurks beneath a subtly re-styled exterior - 3.2 litre, 4.0 litre and supercharged 4.0 litre. These three are the lightest in their class, yet unrivalled in their delivery of refinement, power and economy.

In the cabin, more visible changes have been wrought. A totally new interior which perfectly (in true Jaguar style) wedges the high-tech to the hand-finished. As for that subtly-changed exterior, look a little closer. You'll find the curves a little more satisfying, the grille a tad more rounded, the wheel designs slightly more contemporary. Some significant changes. But discreet enough to leave those classic and class-leading looks unspoilt. Once unwrapped, the Jaguar V8 XJ Series should be immediately unleashed. Don't dream it. Drive it.

Bath puts the green back into food shopping

A new kind of food market is being pioneered in Britain. If successful it could radically change the way we buy and sell our food. Michael Streeter follows the trail from Rio to Bath.

Piles of carrots, a few bottles of organic wine and slabs of goats cheese may be unlikely ingredients for a revolution, but in Bath they are the start of a new way of shopping. On Saturday the Georgian city held the second of three Farmers' Markets, a concept which is flourishing in the United States.

The idea is so simple that it seems astonishing that these markets are the first of their kind in Britain in modern times. Farmers, producers and craftsmen within a set radius - in this case 35 miles - bring in their goods to a city market area and sell them directly to the public.

There are no middle men, very little transport is needed, and the customer knows exactly what they are getting - and from whom. To ensure all the produce is local, nothing from outside the set area can be sold.

Among the 40 sellers and 4,000 customers at Saturday's City Centre market, there was genuine enthusiasm both for the market pilot scheme and the atmosphere it created. "It's like being on holiday - people are laughing and talking together," said one stallholder.

The belated British attempt to establish the Farmers' Market, which are popular in American cities such as New York, stems from the 1992 Rio Summit. That established Agenda 21, a programme to encourage sustainability, which has been taken up by local authorities under Local Agenda 21. The markets are aimed at creating sustainability within a local economy and reducing the transportation of products - or "food miles".

The instigator of the markets in Bath is Patricia Tutt, Local Agenda 21 co-ordinator for Bath and North-east Somerset council. "I got the idea from a book," she said. "We had to overcome lots of obstacles, you need licences for just about everything, but because we are part of the council we had a lot of support."

The biggest obstacle, however, came from producers themselves, many of them small-scale business people working hard to scrape a living. "There was an assumption that people would want to buy the produce, but producers were not convinced that taking a full day off would be worth it," said Ms Tutt.

"We had to twist their arms to come - but they were overwhelmed by the success."

Sue Elcock of Special Plants, which grows unusual plants, welcomed the new markets. "It's an attempt to encourage people in Bath to buy things that are produced in Bath. People don't realise what is on their doorstep."

The items on sale so far at the markets include free-range pork, honey, chutneys, mead and home baking. If they are judged successful enough - the last trial market is next month - it will become a regular event.

The Bath experiment has attracted interest from other councils, raising the hope that the Farmers' Markets could one day become as common as they are in the United States, where there are 2,400, including several in Manhattan.

However, the markets cannot survive as quaint tourist attractions subsidised by local authorities. Leeds City Council, which is examining schemes for a Farmers' Market of its own, is undecided. Project manager Colin Mawhinney said: "We are very interested, but it depends on its commercial viability. That is the key issue."

Getting fresh: Bath's Farmers' Market has revived the old practice of local growers bringing their produce to sell in town. Buyers and sellers (top) can have direct contact, as their is no middle man, and customers can see exactly what they are getting, as with these seasonal vegetables (left and inset)
